I will state the proposition again, so that it may be perfectly understood. It is, that a man who is drafted and furnishes a substitute or pays the money to procure one, shall not be subject to duty, if again drafted, until all the persons enrolled have been drafted. When they have all been enrolled and drafted and paid their money or got substitutes, they will be on the same footing; they will all be served alike. Then you might again, with some justice, put them all back into the ballot-box and draft again when the necessities of the nation require it; but you should not take a substitute from a drafted man, or take his money, and then so arrange it as to draft him again when there are thousands already on the roll who have never been drafted at all. I do not wish to take further time on this question at present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there is no injustice, and the Senator will see that there is no difficulty, in enforcing my proposition, if he will allow me to illustrate my meaning by a supposable case. Suppose that he and I are subject to draft, and I am first drafted. It is not convenient for me to go, and he would go for $300. I employ him to take my place and go into the service of the country, and pay him $300; and I take his place on the enrollment, subject to future draft. We exchange places, precisely as if his name was drawn and mine remained. Is there anything wrong in this? If by the turn of the wheel in a future draft my name should be drawn again, I only stand in his shoes; I take his place. I purchase a temporary and perhaps a permanent exemption for $300, and the United States lose nothing.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is not that, but it is the other proposition I am talking about. I am talking about the taking a man's $300 and subjecting him to be drafted again when you do not pay him back his money; and also about the drafting of a man who has furnished a substitute.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will take that case. It is the purpose of the law, as the Senator agrees, to prevent the price of substitutes going beyond the means of men in ordinary circumstances. For this object we fixed the rate of commutation at $300. We authorized the employment of a substitute or the payment of $300 to operate alike as an exemption for three years from military service. Now, to resume my illustration, suppose that, instead of employing the gentleman who is on the enrollment list with me to act in my place, I pay to the Government $300 to be relieved from that draft, but upon condition that my name is retained on the list for future drafts; is it any hardship? I receive the same benefit by the payment of the $300 to the Government as if paid to him.

Mr. COLLAMER. Will the gentleman answer me this question: would it not be hard, when you have paid your $300 to the Government for the purpose of getting a substitute, that you should be subject to draft again, when there are thousands on the roll who have never been drafted? Should they not be placed on the same footing with you? Then there would be some equality.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is impossible to have any system of draft that will equally distribute its burdens. I may think it hard that I should be drafted a second time instead of other persons on the list; but the chances must determine. When all are not needed, some must be taken. Who shall be selected? It has been deemed by military nations wisest and best to resort to the draft, because that is impartial; it knows no difference between the rich and the poor; all men take their chance. The draft is therefore considered fairer, rather than to divide the whole community into classes, but it may in many cases operate hardly and unjustly. We must look at the present law in order to obviate the objections to it. All those subject to military duty are now enrolled. It is a capital of, say, three million persons subject to military duty. The Government wants, say, twenty per cent. of them to render military service. They make a draft for that twenty per cent. Under the present law, the persons drafted whose services are needed in the field may get rid of the draft by the payment of $300. The wants of the Government are not supplied, the wants of the Government are not satisfied. Under the law, as the gentleman properly construes it, the payment of $300 exempts a man from military service for three years; and the fear was at the War Department that if this system was carried on, if your law of last winter was executed in its words and according to its meaning, you might get an army, but that you would exhaust the basis of the draft. By your law you agreed that men who had been drafted should, upon the payment of $300, be discharged from military service for three years; and yet the exigencies of the country might demand that their service should be rendered within three years. This was a danger which must be avoided; it was a danger that was pointed out with great force by the Senator from Indiana. He has never been answered. We must not impair the basis of the draft, and I can perceive no way to avoid it but to provide that if a man pays money for commutation his name must again be placed upon the roll, or the result will be that we may have one army without any chance of reinforcements or without any basis for further calls.

Mr. COLLAMER. Let me ask the gentleman what is the difficulty, when a man's name is drawn out, if he has paid the $300, in permitting him to remain discharged until the rest have been drafted?

Mr. SHERMAN. That would be just if his $300 employed a substitute not subject to draft; but the general effect would be for the substitute to be taken from among those subject to draft. The $300 may be entirely insufficient, or two names would be stricken from the enrollment and but one secured for the service. My amendment provides for two classes of substitutes: one, those not subject to military duty, as unnaturalized foreigners, who are not subject to military duty under our laws; or minors who are under twenty years of age; or those who have already served their country and are called veterans. They are relieved from draft. Now, if a drafted person from among those not subject to draft secures a substitute and puts him into the ranks of the armies of the United States, he has furnished to the Government of the United States a full substitute in its proper sense—a man not subject to military duty, who could not be called upon for military duty. If he places him in the ranks, he has furnished the Government a substitute without weakening or drawing from the basis upon which this draft rests. Therefore he should have, and I give him, the full benefit of the substitute, and relieve him from service for three years, the time for which he was drafted. But if, on the other hand, he goes among those who are themselves subject to military duty and gets a person who may at the next turn of the wheel be himself drafted, he should take the chances of that substitute for all future drafts. This will not operate hardly; but if, on the other hand, you do not adopt some expedient like this—and I do not say that this is perfect—if you adopt the views of the Military Committee, you will excite resistance to your draft. How does this bill now stand? Under the provisions of the bill as reported by the Military Committee no man can hire a substitute unless he hires one from among those not subject to draft. He cannot relieve himself from military duty by the payment of any sum of money whatever. The draft is arbitrary, compulsory; the price of substitutes will rise enormously; there will be cases in every community of great hardship, where every good man will feel that the person ought not to be dragged from his family or business to render military service. Persons will be drafted who have hundreds of families dependent on them for employment, and if the draft is rigidly enforced they would be drawn away, and hundreds of women and children would lose their daily bread. Every just man will say that cases of this kind ought to be provided for by wise legislators. An imperative draft which allows no reasonable substitution, which allows no commutation, cannot and will not be enforced.

Under these circumstances we must provide some way by which when men are drafted and they cannot go, they can either hire substitutes or commute military service. What does the Government desire? The Government does not desire to oppress the citizen; it only desires military service. If that military service is rendered, either by the drafted man or by a substitute, it ought to be accepted, at the same time having always in view to keep unimpaired the basis of drafting, the great body of our citizens who may at any time be called upon to render military service.

Mr. President, I have met this question in relation to the $300 clause during one of the most exciting political campaigns that have ever been held in this country. I know that demagogues on the stump declared that this $300 exemption clause was intended to favor the rich at the expense of the poor. We met that charge; but when the subject was fairly discussed before intelligent people, I saw but few but were satisfied and convinced of the injustice of that charge.

Suppose you repeal the $300 exemption clause; suppose you allow no commutation at all for military service, but make the draft absolute: what then becomes the condition of the poor man? The poor man may be dragged from the dead body of his wife into the military service of the United States unless there is some way of commuting. If there is no commutation, then the price of substitutes rises so high that none but the rich can procure a substitute. If a rich man is drafted he may go out, and with his thousands he may hire a substitute from among those who come to us from foreign lands. You cannot by any law whatever prevent him from availing himself of the use of his money. Therefore I say this commutation clause was intended for the benefit of the poor. It has operated to the benefit of the poor. The mistake was that the operation of that commutation clause was to exempt the drafted man from all military service, instead of simply placing him back on the roll subject to future draft. There was the mistake—a mistake into which I fell as well as others. The idea of enforcing the law arbitrarily, without giving any opportunity of commutation, will only excite resistance. As for the spirit of demagogism that was excited against this feature of the law, I would meet it with argument—with good, sound sense; and our people are intelligent enough everywhere to listen to those arguments. Let demagogues avail themselves of this legislation; it is our business to do what is right, and depend upon the judgment of our constituents. I have no doubt that in Ohio we gained votes by the very fact that we had provided a way by which a man in reasonable circumstances who was drafted, and who could not go into the Army, might pay money in lieu of military service.

I desire to retain that provision of the law in some form. It may be that the amount inserted was too low. I would be prepared to increase it to $500, if $500 was found to be necessary to hire a substitute; but that some mode of commutation must be provided by any law of this kind, it seems to me, is capable of absolute proof. In all the laws of Europe on this subject, in the French law, in every drafting law that I have read—and I have read many of them—there is some mode of commutation. The principle is recognized everywhere that there are cases and incidents in the life of men when they cannot be dragged away from their families, their business, and their domestic relations, and those cases must be provided for. The Government has the right to the military service of every citizen, but it must enforce that right with the least injury to the citizen himself; and if the citizen is willing at any time to furnish a substitute, or something equivalent to his military service, that ought to be freely accepted by the Government. It seems to me the objections made by the Senator from Vermont are not well taken.

Mr. COLLAMER. I confined my remarks to the effect of the payment of the $300 commutation or the procuring of a substitute.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I have answered the honorable Senator on that point. If I have not satisfied him; it is because I am not able to do so. His proposition is this: that if a man pays $300 that should exempt him from military service—

Mr. COLLAMER. Until all in that class have been served in the same way.

Mr. SHERMAN. We only come back to my original proposition. I take the case of he and I both being subject to military duty. If I, being drafted, hire him to take my place, ought not I to take his on the list subject to future drafts? If this supposed arrangement between him and me, an arrangement in which the Government has no part, does not make it clear, then I cannot make it clear. The payment of $300 ought not to be allowed to operate any more in my favor than the arrangement of substitution I have mentioned. I would put the two on the same basis. An arrangement between two persons subject to draft ought to have precisely the same effect, and no other, as the payment of $300, no more, no less. A drafted man ought to take the place of his substitute on the roll, and if the fortune of chance, which is always blind, should designate him on the second draft before those who have not been drafted at all, it is his misfortune, not his fault. It is no worse and no more unjust than any other system of drafting that can be devised by men. We have no presiding goddess who can distribute the ballots according to the ability of men to render military service. The draft often operates hardly, and sometimes unjustly. It makes queer combinations. It sometimes takes two out of a family. I know that in its enforcement it has operated very singularly. It has taken two sons, the only members of the family liable to service, and left all the rest of the neighborhood exempt. We cannot avoid the inequalities of the draft, because we can prescribe no rule by which military service shall be rendered except by the uncertain decision of chance.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is certainly mistaken in regard to the amendment pending before us, as reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. The Senator understands—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The Chair will state that the question immediately before the Senate is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.]

Mr. WILSON. I am aware of that. The Senator understands that by the provisions of this amendment persons who are liable to draft cannot be accepted as substitutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. WILSON. The fourth section of the bill provides that a person enrolled may furnish a substitute if the substitute furnished is not liable to draft; but by the original bill a person after he is drafted may furnish a substitute who is liable to draft. That is not changed in this bill. The Senator proposes an amendment to meet, and I think correct, that defect in the law. I am in favor of his first proposition; and that is, that a person drafted obtaining a substitute liable to draft shall himself take that substitute's place, or be responsible for him if the substitute is afterwards drafted. That is necessary in order to preserve the whole military strength of the country. But I agree with the Senator from Vermont that the other proposition of the Senator from Ohio is not just.

The man who pays his money ought to be placed on the same footing as the man who obtains a substitute; and if the amendment now pending should be voted down, I shall propose an amendment to the section reported by the committee repealing the commutation clause which, I think, places the matter right, and meets the objection made by the Senator from Vermont, and in which I agree with him. It is as follows:

That any person enrolled and drafted may pay to such person as the Secretary of War may designate to receive it, $300 for the procurement of substitutes, and such person so paying $300 for the procurement of substitutes shall be exempt from draft until such time as he shall again become liable to draft by reason of the exhaustion of the class from which the draft shall be made; but such exemption shall not exceed the time for which such person shall have been drafted.

Let the person who pays the money be exempted from being drafted until all the other persons who have not been drafted are drafted, and then he will be again liable.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator whether, under his proposition, the man who pays commutation money would not get more by that payment than he who hires a substitute from among those subject to military duty. It would give the payment of money a greater force than the hiring of a substitute.

Mr. WILSON. I think he would by the Senator's amendment, and I hope he will modify his amendment so as to put these drafted persons on the same ground. There is a great distinction between them now, according to the Senator's amendment. For instance, if a drafted person obtains a substitute not liable to draft, he is exempted, under that amendment, for the whole term of service; if he presents a substitute who is liable to draft, he takes that substitute's place and is answerable for him. That is the way I understand the Senator's amendment. I propose in this amendment that the person paying the money shall be exempted for the whole term, or until the class from which he has been drafted is exhausted.

Mr. COLLAMER. The classes are stricken out in this bill.

Mr. WILSON. They are proposed to be stricken out; but we can change it so as to provide that the entire number of persons liable to the draft shall be first drafted; and why should it not be so? In my judgment it is better to furnish the money than to furnish a substitute, and I think the money paid has been much better used than the substitutes obtained; and I will tell you why. The money paid to the Government has been used to recruit these old veterans. It has been used to raise men in the sections of the country where our armies have advanced, and has thus much relieved the sections of the country upon which the draft fell heavily. We raised about twenty-five thousand persons as substitutes. Several thousand of them when first offered were generally pretty poor men, and vast numbers of them deserted at the first favorable moment. A class of men floating about the country were first picked up and used as substitutes, and before they went into the Army and after they went into the Army they deserted whenever they could do so. Afterwards there came a better class of men. They have entered the service and are doing their duty with great fidelity. I had rather to-day, if a draft were made, that the money should be paid and the Government raise the substitutes than to have this man-broker business going on in the country with its consequent demoralization and the obtaining of a class of men very many of whom never mean to serve the country but merely to get the money. I would place the man who paid the commutation on the same footing with the man who obtained a substitute; let him take his choice; and therefore I propose that he shall be exempted for the time for which he was drafted, or until the persons who have not been drafted at all have been drafted, and then he comes in and makes the whole strength of the country.

Mr. COWAN. I would suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that that is a very different thing. It is one thing to exempt a man for the time for which he has been drafted and another to exempt him until the whole number of names in the wheel shall be drawn. One is definite and the other is indefinite; one is fixed and the other may never happen.

Mr. WILSON. I will read it, and I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to it, to see if he can better it. If it can be made clearer, I should be glad to have it done.

He shall be exempt from draft until such time as he shall again become liable to draft by reason of the exhaustion of the class from which the draft shall be made, but such exemption shall not exceed the time for which such person shall have been drafted.

I think that is complete.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I think much of this difficulty arises out of a misconception of the word "draft." The present law has been a good deal considered in my State by the legal profession, and that section which allowed a man to be exempted for the time for which he was drafted by furnishing a substitute, even though the substitute himself was liable to draft, was always thought to be unjust. But the fair construction of the commutation clause, as it is called, was that it exempted the person paying it from any draft made to fill that call. The President, in the first place, calls for five hundred thousand men. The wheel is brought out and five hundred thousand men are drawn, or a certain number of men take their chance to be drawn, under that call. Those who are drawn and who do not go into the service pay their $300. That exempts them from being drawn for that call. If it should become necessary the next year to raise five hundred thousand other men, they would still be liable to be drawn again, according to a fair construction of the law; and I may say this is based upon the construction given to the old law. Under the act of 1795, the act of 1813, and under our act of 1861, the person drawn, in order to escape actual service, if he desired it, was court-martialed and paid a fine. It was not that the Government offered to the drafted man to commute his service for money, but he was punished by a fine for refusing to appear, when drawn, at the place of rendezvous. By the payment of that fine he was exempted from any further drawing under that call. It was perfectly impossible, indeed, that he could be drawn, or that he could incur any risk of being drawn, under that call, because the call was filled before the court-martial imposed a fine upon him.

It was a little unfortunate, perhaps, when we imposed this $300, which is really a fine, and which ought to be considered in the nature of a fine for not appearing when drawn at the rendezvous, that it was also stated that it should be used to procure a substitute. I think that was unfortunate, because it introduced another and a different idea from that which pervaded the old law. It introduced the idea that you might commute your service for money. The old law repudiated that idea and called it a fine, penalty, punishment—punishment for not doing a duty which you are obliged to do, and which you and all men owe to the country. I think the idea of a fine or penalty should still be preserved, and therefore I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, if the word "draft" in that amendment shall be changed into the word "call," or if it be understood as it used to be that "draft" and "call" are synonymous; because in those times they continued to draft until they filled up the call, and the terms were one and identical. I have no objection to the phraseology as it stands, but if a draft is to be made filling one fifth or one tenth of the call, and then there is to be a suspension and a demand for new legislation, and the thing is to tarry and be delayed over five or six months perhaps, then this word "draft" becomes of very uncertain meaning. It may mean every time the officer brings out the box in order to draw a few names, or it may mean the call, just as people are disposed to put that construction upon it. I think if the word "call" were introduced instead of the word "draft," it would relieve it from all difficulties; and I think the Senator from Ohio has perhaps produced an amendment which will be more satisfactory than any other.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not wish to repeat what I have heretofore said; but I desire to say a very few words in reply to what has been said by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] and the Senator from Ohio in relation to the manner of exhausting the element of draft. Their apprehension seems to be this: that if you draft men and then allow them to employ as substitutes other men who are on the roll subject to being drafted you will soon exhaust your roll, exhaust the element of draft.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. My argument was that if a man could buy himself off for $300 and obtain a certificate of exemption for three years, and the draft was often repeated, you would soon exhaust those liable to military service.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, we always go upon the ground that this commutation money can obtain a substitute. If it is not large enough, to do that, we should increase it so that it will do so. I agree with gentlemen in that particular. But when we have once taken that in as one of the elements of our argument, that the money is paid to procure a substitute and should be enough to do it, and we have said that $300 properly managed would do it, then we take it that that is sufficient, that that will supply a man, and therefore amounts to the same thing as furnishing a substitute.

Now, with the operation of that clause, the element of draft can never be exhausted. In the older States of the Union, and in the older States of Europe, the number of men subject to, and capable of performing military duty is just about one fifth of the population. Instead of being twenty per cent. in some of our States, as appears by the enrollment, and as appears by the returns of the census, it is twenty-two and twenty-three per cent. But take it upon the average that the enrollment, if properly made, would include one fifth of the population. What is our population? I take it is considerably more than twenty millions. Then we should have four millions on the enrollment. Now, take the worst case: that can possibly happen, that one half of those men on the enrollment hire the other half for substitutes, and you would have two million men in the field. I merely state this as a matter of figures, as a matter of certainty, to show that the elements of the draft could not, by any possibility, ever be exhausted by allowing one man to hire another as a substitute.

Then there is another thing to be considered. The number of men whom we obtain year by year by immigration and by coming of age, say twenty years of age, with which to renew the roll, is more than sufficient to cover the number exhausted in this war. They more than keep the supply good. We have not diminished in population at all in the progress of this war. We have increased notwithstanding all our losses. My opinion is, notwithstanding all the losses on both sides during this war, a census taken to-day would show a larger population in the United States and in the seceded States taken together than there was in 1860, before this war commenced. I say, therefore, that any alarm at the idea that the hiring of substitutes from the same enrollment will ever exhaust the elements of your draft cannot be well founded or well entertained, and I think it should be dismissed at once.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, if I could agree with the Senator from Ohio in his premises, I should also agree with him in his conclusions; but I do not understand that there is any danger of exhausting the basis of our draft. The Senator, I apprehend, underrates that basis. It appears from the report of the Provost Marshal General that the enrollment amounts to over three million one hundred thousand persons. The draft that has already taken place on a call for three hundred thousand men is once and a half that number, and of course it may be supposed to have exhausted of the basis four hundred and fifty thousand men. Now, sir, that may be repeated six times more upon this very enrollment before it is exhausted. Seven such drafts may be made upon this basis before it is exhausted. I am unwilling to contemplate—

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I hope the Senator will pardon me for one moment. I have the figures here. There were in round numbers enrolled a little over three millions. The last draft was for three hundred thousand men. Of that number one third were rejected as physically incompetent. That is not stricken out of the Senator's calculation. Another third, or almost another third, bought themselves off by exemption. That is not stricken out of the Senator's calculation. Now, how often will you repeat that draft before you exhaust the basis?

Mr. HARRIS. I am still correct in what I have stated, that we may have six more such drafts as that which has taken place before the enrollment is exhausted. It is true that out of the four hundred and fifty thousand men drafted one third were exempted for physical and mental disability, and nearly one third more as being aliens and non-residents, and already in the service, and excused on account of their social and domestic condition; so that really but about perhaps one hundred and fifty thousand of the four hundred and fifty thousand would be held; and of this number it is further true that about twenty per cent. did not appear, so that we did not get by the draft anything like the three hundred thousand men who were called for. That is true; but it is still true that the call for three hundred thousand men may be repeated six times before this basis is exhausted. As I was about to say, I cannot contemplate, I will not contemplate, such a condition of things in our country as that we shall have occasion to repeat six times a draft for three hundred thousand men. All we have to do, in my judgment, is to carry on vigorously the efforts now being made to fill up our Army by recruiting and by drafting, prepare for a vigorous and energetic campaign in the spring, and we shall never have occasion for another draft. I think the Senate this morning has secured the country all the soldiers that will be needed for the spring campaign without any draft at all. The recruiting that is now going forward will be amply sufficient to replenish our Army in such a way as that the draft will not need to be enforced, except, perhaps, in a very few localities.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I will state to him that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, which was read at the table this morning, was written after conference with the Secretary of War, and showed that they only relied upon obtaining fifty thousand veterans and fifty thousand new recruits under the system of bounties spoken of by the Senator. They only relied on raising one hundred thousand in that way. I think that calculation is too small; but I merely mention it to the Senator as the opinion of the two officers of the Government having the matter in charge.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know what the estimate of the Secretary of War may be, nor do I know what view the Secretary of the Treasury may take on the subject. This I know: there was a call made on the 17th of October last for three hundred thousand men; I know that the quota under that call has been assigned to the different States and localities; and I know that under that call volunteers are coming forward in such numbers in many parts of my own State, whose quota is considerably more than one fifth of the entire call—some sixty-eight thousand—that in all probability in a very few weeks the whole quota of that State will be raised. I understand from the Senator from Vermont that the quota of his State is raised. I understand it is raised in other States, and more too; and there is every reason to believe that before the 1st of March, which is the time limited by the resolution passed by the Senate this morning, this entire amount of three hundred thousand will be raised. Sir, is not that all we need? Is not that all the War Department asks for to replenish our Army? Where, then, will be the necessity of a draft, except it be, as I have said before, in some few localities where the recruiting has not been pushed forward with vigor and energy?

I am in favor, at least for the present, of allowing those who are drafted to pay a commutation. This bill as it came to us from the Committee on Military Affairs was so oppressive that I agree with the Senator from Ohio it could not be enforced, and in my judgment ought not to be enforced. It is a bill which will operate with such severity upon our community as that it ought not to be enforced against them. Sir, we are not yet reduced to the extremity of forcing men away from their families under all circumstances and in all emergencies for the purpose of saving our country. If we could not obtain recruits, I should be willing to send the last man, no matter how great the sacrifices it might cost him, to the Army; but we have not reached that point yet. We should allow our citizens when they are drafted to furnish substitutes; we should allow them to commute; and we should make this severe law as little oppressive as possible. I am, therefore, in favor of allowing a commutation.

In my judgment, however, the commutation ought to be increased. I think the condition of the country, the condition of our people, is such as that the drafted man now may pay what it costs to enlist a veteran soldier; and I should be in favor, and if no one else shall do it, I shall move an amendment which shall fix the amount of commutation at $400, the amount now paid by the Government as bounty to a veteran soldier. I think it ought to be done. But, sir, I would not do the unjust thing of making a man hire a substitute or pay commutation and then return his name and make him liable again to be called into service or to pay commutation or to furnish a substitute until the basis of the draft is exhausted. This enrollment by the law itself only continues until March, 1865, when a new enrollment is to be made, and then this whole matter will be reorganized and rearranged. As the Senator from Vermont has well said, the number of persons liable to draft will be largely increased by those coming of the proper age or becoming naturalized citizens, and they will be placed on a new enrollment when we have occasion for it. But, sir, I apprehend there are none of us who suppose we shall have occasion for a draft after March, 1865, and this basis of enrollment is quite sufficient to last us until that time.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts?

MR. SUMNER. I should like to recall the attention of the Senate to that amendment. The Senator from Ohio, not contenting himself with opposing that amendment, introduced other and extraneous matter which has been under discussion since, and the effect of which has been to divert attention from the original proposition. But if I can have the attention of the Senator from Ohio for a few minutes, it seems to me—I do not know—I may even satisfy him at least that his argument against my proposition was not well founded.

If I understood the Senator from Ohio, he objected to my proposition on the ground, in the first place, that it was an unusual tax; or, in other words, that it was a tax. Sir, what is the draft but a tax? The draft compels all the persons who are drafted to contribute their strength, their muscles, their lives to the defense of the Republic. That, if I understand it aright, is the highest tax the country can impose. But still further, what is the commutation money which the statute now positively requires but a tax? If, then, there be anything in the argument of the Senator from Ohio, the draft itself and the commutation money of $300 itself is a tax, and is therefore objectionable. Neither one nor the other, in a just sense, is a tax, because neither one nor the other is any imposition for the purpose of revenue; and I ask the attention of the Senator to the distinction; neither one nor the other is an imposition for the purpose of revenue. I do not present this amendment on any such ground. I present it simply and distinctly on one ground—the duty of equalizing, if possible, this burden, so that it shall bear, so far as we can make it, alike upon the rich and the poor. Now, I have to say that that burden is not equalized, and that it does not bear alike upon the rich and the poor if you make the poor man pay $300 and the rich man pay no more.

But the Senator went further. Not content with objecting to my proposition on the ground that it was a tax, he complained that it was an exorbitant tax; and he asked me whether in all history I could point to any instance of a tax of thirty per cent. on income. It seems to me it should be the pride of our country at this moment, that on an occasion like this it should not resort to history in order to determine whether it shall equalize a burden upon the rich and the poor. Because other nations have not undertaken to equalize a burden upon the rich and the poor, is that a reason why we should not set the example? But is the tax exorbitant? I will read it:

"On all income over $600 and not over $2,000, ten per cent.; over $2,000 and not over $5,000, twenty per cent.; and on all income over $5,000, thirty per cent."

Now, the Senator complains of the thirty per cent.; that is, thirty per cent. on an income over $5,000. Suppose a person with an income over $5,000 should be drafted, I put it to the Senator from Ohio, what sum would be too great for him to pay as a commutation for his exemption from the draft, carrying with it, as that draft does, exposure to death, disease, wounds, with the absolute employment of his time during the period of one, two, or three years, according to the duration of the draft? Is thirty per cent. on an income above $5,000 a year too much for such a person to pay? Is it exorbitant? Is that the estimate which the Senator puts upon such an exposure? He requires $300 from the poor man who has no income; but he thinks it exorbitant to require thirty per cent. on the income of a man whose income is over $5,000. Sir, I do not think that, even as I have it here in this proposition, there is equality. If any objection can be brought against this proposition, it is that it is too lenient; that it does not go far enough.

I am sure, sir, eminent as that Senator is, and justly representing his own State, that he does not represent on this question every citizen of that State. I have in my hand a letter which I received since this proposition was brought forward, dated at Cincinnati, the 6th of January, from a most respectable citizen, from which I ask leave to read three or four sentences; and I read it simply to show how this proposition strikes citizens at a distance, but who have the same interest in it that we have. He says:

"Permit a stranger to address a few words to you expressive of approbation of your bill!"

He calls it a bill, but it is only a proposition of amendment—

"providing for a revision of the enrollment act, so as to afford a sliding scale of commutation for the draft, the object being to rate commutation according to the means of the drafted individual." I quote from telegrams of this morning's news. In my humble opinion you have hit the nail on the head. I think this is the only method to equalize the burden and satisfy all claims for justice and equitable dealing. When any fixed sum is indicated as the commutation fee to exempt from actual military duty, it needs but little reflection to see that it indirectly imposes a premium upon property while it taxes the poor."

Then he goes on to suppose a case somewhat at length, quite elaborately, indeed, between two citizens of Cincinnati, neighbors, whom he minutely describes, and finally winds up that part of his communication by saying:

"Suppose the latter person?"

"is drafted. Why $300 is no more to him than a three-penny loaf to the other person. Am I not right that a fixed sum for exemption imposes a tax upon honest poverty and a premium upon wealth?"

This excellent citizen of Ohio objects to the whole theory of the Senator from Ohio as a tax upon honest poverty and a premium upon wealth. The Senator opposes my proposition as a tax upon wealth. Call it, if you please, a tax upon wealth. I say that the occasion has come when it should be made. But I myself put aside the phrase, I put aside the idea, except in the general sense, that the draft itself is a tax; the commutation money of $300 is a tax; and the proposition that I make simply aims to equalize that tax.

MR. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I have given some reflection—

MR. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me a moment to reply to the Senator from Massachusetts?

MR. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps my honorable friend may want to reply to me.

MR. SHERMAN. Oh, no.

MR. DOOLITTLE. Very well; I give way.

MR. SHERMAN. I shall detain the Senate but a moment. I listened with pleasure to the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, and hoped I should be convinced by them, but I am not yet convinced, and therefore will briefly state the reasons.

The Senator says he cannot draw a distinction between the commutation and a tax. I think any dictionary will furnish him with that distinction. A commutation is a fixed price put upon military service. The price fixed by our law is $300, to be paid in lieu of military service, a fixed price as the commutation. A tax does not depend upon the person. A tax is variable, depending upon the amount of property. In this country poll taxes are not allowed by our Constitution. A tax is a rate upon property, depending upon the amount. We know what the commutation of $300 means. It is a substitution for military service. The tax proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is not a commutation; it is not a fixed sum; it is a variable sum dependent upon the property of the person drafted; it is a tax, an income-tax. There is the distinction.

But let us go a little further. The Senator asks, why is it oppressive to take thirty per cent. of the income of a wealthy man? Why, sir, if necessary, I will take the whole income of the wealthy and the poor, in order to carry out this contest, and to preserve this country. I will take the whole property of the people of the United States, as we have the power and the right to do—the property of the rich and the results of the labor of the poor—and I will take every citizen and put him in the Army, if necessary, to preserve our nationality and our country. But that is not the question. When we come to levy taxes, the Constitution and our oath of office, as well as our plain duty, require us to make those taxes equal and just, bearing upon all alike, depending upon the amount of their property and their ability to pay. That is the principle. There are Senators here, some above the age of forty-five, and some below the age of forty-five, who are wealthy. What right have you to impose an income tax of thirty per cent. on those who are under that age, and exempt entirely the property of men above that age? Is that a legal tax?

MR. SUMNER. I will ask the Senator what right have we to limit the period of military service, and to make our call as we have on persons between the ages of twenty and thirty-five? It is on the same ground on which you limit that call to persons within the ages of twenty and thirty-five that I limit this tax, if the Senator pleases so to call it. I do not call it a tax, but it is a substitute for commutation money.

MR. SHERMAN. In reply to the first question, why we limit the term of service, I answer, because we do not want the service longer than for the term we limit. That is a sufficient answer to that. The Senator asks why we take men between the ages of twenty and thirty-five. Because those men make the best soldiers. The Government has the right to call on the best men to defend it. That is the answer. But when you come to levy taxes, then your duty is to make those taxes equal, fair, and just to all alike. There is no reason why you levy this tax only on those who, in addition to their duty to pay taxes, have to perform military service. Why should you put this income tax only on the young, energetic, and active, who are accumulating property, and relieve those who have already accumulated and have no longer need of large incomes? If it were not invidious I might take the case of certain members of the Senate, some of whom are subject to military duty, and some not, and apply this tax to them, and the glaring injustice of it would at once be seen. The young are liable to military duty, and they are liable to pay taxes. They render their military duty. The old are exempt from military duty, but they are still liable to pay taxes. Will the Senator make the young and active perform military duty and pay taxes also, and exempt the old not only from military duty, but from taxes besides? There will be the inequality involved in the proposition of the honorable Senator. It will not reach those who ought to pay the taxes, while it throws the whole load on those who are to perform military service. That is the full answer to this discrimination. If the Senator wishes to raise a fund out of which to buy substitutes, let him impose an income tax of five or ten per cent., operating on all alike, and make a discrimination against the incomes of the rich. Our present law is based upon that idea. The income tax upon the smaller incomes is three per cent.; on the higher incomes it is five per cent.; and I am perfectly willing, if it be necessary, to make it still higher. The discrimination ought always to be made against large incomes, but when you come to tax incomes, it ought to apply to all alike.

My friend from Massachusetts quotes a letter from one of my constituents against me. I have no doubt my constituents differ in regard to this matter just as we do here. But I think if my constituent had this case before him, he would agree with me. There are some very wealthy men in Cincinnati who are above the age of forty-five, and there are some very wealthy men who have accumulated property who are under the age of forty-five. If the proposition was made only to tax those under forty-five, and not those above forty-five, I think my constituent will see the injustice of it. There is the case. We have here a letter written upon a casual proposition in one of the newspapers, without being read, without having any connection with the subject-matter, without knowing how far it goes. Is that opinion to be brought up here against the deliberate judgment of Senators who are acting upon their official oath with all the matter before them? I hardly think so. My constituent may be right from the view in which the question presents itself to him, and yet I think, if he were better advised of the subject-matter, there is scarcely any one in Ohio, with due deference to the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts, who will not agree with me that this proposed tax is onerous and oppressive upon the most active and industrious men in the country.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator still returns to his original idea. It seems to me, if he will allow me to say so, he misapprehends the bill before us. We are not discussing a tax bill. We are discussing a bill relating to the draft; and we are now engaged in perfecting that bill, in devising such amendments, so far as we can, as to make that draft equal on the country. There is no question of a tax anywhere; yet the Senator perpetually repeats that I am proposing a tax. I propose no such thing. The existing legislation requiring that our fellow-citizens shall be drafted, I propose to reinforce for the benefit of the Republic by making that system of draft more equal than it now is in its burdens; and the Senator tells us that I am proposing a tax. I have already replied that I propose no tax any more than he himself proposed a tax, any more than the original bill proposed a tax. I propose to soften the tax which is imposed by the original bill, if the Senator from Ohio will persist in saying that we are talking of a tax. I utterly deny the whole suggestion. It is no question of a tax; it is simply a question of how a burden onerous, sometimes bitter, often painful and pregnant with death, shall be made, so far as we can, more agreeable, more equal to the people. That is my single object, and I am not to be diverted from that object by the false cry that I am imposing a tax.

Then there is another suggestion of the Senator. He says that it is unequal in this respect, inasmuch as it acts only upon persons under a certain age; but that same argument is good also against the draft itself, which acts only upon persons under a certain age; and as my object is simply to soften the draft, I naturally make this commutation, which I now propose applicable only to the draft. The Senator says that there are certain persons advanced in life among our richest people who would not come under the provisions of my amendment; but those persons do not come under the provisions of the draft. If they were exposed to the draft, they would be exposed to my amendment; but as they are not exposed to the draft, they are not exposed to my amendment, nor should they be exposed to that amendment. The question is a simple one. It is, whether in imposing this great burden upon the country you will take into candid consideration the actual condition of the persons upon whom it bears, or whether you will imperiously require from all alike, rich and poor, one unalterable sum. Sir, I am for recognizing that inequality of condition which, according to the laws of Providence, exists; and, recognizing that inequality, I would go as far as I could with a helping hand to smooth it, to remove it, to make it more easy to be borne.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, every citizen owes to the Government, for its protection, not only his property, but, more than that, his personal service, if he is able to render it. We have bills which provide for taxes upon property. Those bills may be defective, it is true, and may need amendment. But, sir, the bill before us is one which calls for the personal service of the citizens of the United States in the Army. It is a call for men to rally around the flag of the country, and every able-bodied man owes that duty and that allegiance. Without going into any lengthy remarks on this subject, I will state that the idea contained in the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts seems to me to be founded in justice. When a person is called upon to render his personal service, you propose to give to him the means of exempting himself from that service. Now, in pointing out the mode of obtaining exemption, will you have no regard whatever to the condition of the individual who is to be exempted? Will you put the same burden upon the rich as upon the poor? That is the question.

This law, as it exists at present, requiring the payment of the sum of $300 by way of exemption, operates more hardly and with more severity upon the poor married man than upon any other person in the country. The Senator from New York has suggested that the price of exemption should be raised to $500. I would not have it raised to any but the unmarried men of the country, because unmarried men can more easily raise this amount of money by pledging their service or making an agreement to labor in advance than the poor married man with his family on his hands; they can more certainly secure an exemption.

I agree, too, with the Senator from Ohio in one idea he has expressed, and that is, that the names of these persons who have paid this money to obtain substitutes should not be taken altogether from the rolls. It seems to me, however, that the idea of the Senator from Vermont is a correct one, that their names, though retained upon the rolls, should be retained with the understanding that they are not to be drafted again until the whole draft is exhausted. I agree, too, in the confident belief expressed by the Senator from New York that we shall not have to be compelled, in fact, to resort to another draft when we shall have once filled up the old regiments of the Army by the addition of the three hundred thousand men now called for.

I believe, sir, that when the old regiments are filled up with men who are to serve for three years they will finish this rebellion, and that it will not be necessary in fact to make any other draft. At the same time it is of vast consequence that we provide by-law that in case of necessity we may make a draft, for the moral power of such a law clothing the Executive with the authority not only to use the three hundred thousand who will be added to the armies now in the field, but giving to him the power from time to time to call on the whole three millions to reinforce the armies—the moral power contained in that provision will go very far toward putting down the rebellion. My confident belief is that when our present armies are filled up with recruits to serve not for one year, nor two years, but for three years, and when we shall have passed, as in the course of a few months we must pass, through a presidential election, and the people of the country shall have decided to place in the executive chair a Commander-in-chief of the armies and the navies who is bound to pursue the policy of this Government to crush this rebellion without compromise, the rebellion will yield, and it will not yield until then.

Mr. President, I have said that I believed the idea which is contained in the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts is a just one. It is possible he may have made the rate per cent. higher than is necessary to make this equalization, but I shall vote with him for the proposition.

Mr. WILSON. The proposition made by my colleague is just in its object, but it seems to me that in the form in which it is presented it ought certainly to be amended before we vote upon it. I move to strike out in the twelfth line—

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER.) The Chair will state that this being an amendment to an amendment is not susceptible of being amended. It may be modified by the mover himself, but it is not susceptible of amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Is that rule applicable on a motion to strike out the whole clause?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that a motion to strike out and insert, as this is, is an amendment, and being an amendment to an amendment, it is not susceptible of amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot say precisely what the rule is, but it seems to me that we ought to have the privilege of amending the proposed amendment, which is in the form of a substitute, before we vote upon it. At any rate, I will suggest to my colleague the changes which I think should be made in his proposition. Instead of saying that this additional tax shall be levied on incomes of $600 and over, I think he ought to limit it to incomes of $1,500 or over. It will be a pretty heavy tax upon a person having an income of $1,000 or $1,500 to pay $300. Then I think that there should be no distinction in the amount of percentage according to the income. I think the amount proposed is too large. Ten per cent. would be a large taxation. Thirty per cent. on a sum above $5,000 would amount to a great deal. I do not think that we ought to put those provisions in the bill. If my colleague will propose a tax of ten per cent. on an income above $1,000 or $1,500 the proposition would be a just and a fair one, but in its present form it seems to me to be rather an extravagant proposition.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand my colleague as suggesting that I should strike out $600 and put in $1,500, and propose a tax of ten per cent. on all above $1,500?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, that would make a pretty large taxation.

Mr. SUMNER. In this matter I wish to consult the Senate, and, of course, shall be guided very much by those who I know have given great attention to this subject. At the suggestion of my colleague, I propose to alter my amendment so that it shall read:

On all incomes over $1,000 and not over $2,000, five per cent.; on all incomes over $2,000 and not over $3,000, ten per cent.; and on all incomes over $3,000, twenty per cent.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, as modified by the Senator from Massachusetts, who moved it, it being within the power of the mover to modify his own proposed amendment.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dixon, Doolittle, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Rahsey, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Powell, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Willey—25.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected; and the question recurred on the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the enacting clause of the proposed section, and inserting the following:

That any person enrolled and drafted may pay to such person as the Secretary of War may designate to receive it, $300 for the procurement of a substitute, and such person so paying $300 for the procurement of a substitute shall be exempt from draft until such time as he shall again become liable to draft by reason of the exhaustion of the enrollment from which the draft shall be made, but such exemption shall not exceed the time for which such person shall have been drafted: Provided, That any married person not possessed of property who labors for a livelihood at some trade or occupation, the annual income from which does not exceed $400, shall pay $300: And provided further, That any person whose taxable property shall exceed $10,000, or who may be in receipt of an annual income exceeding $2,000, shall pay $600.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, one feature of that amendment has been debated at considerable length, and there are two questions upon which Senators seem to be at issue. One is whether the principle incorporated into the amendment will exhaust the basis of the draft; the other is whether we can afford to stand the exhaustion, supposing that it will, or whether it will enfeeble it, weaken it, diminish it. As I understood the issue between the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Vermont, the former contended that it would reduce the basis of the draft, and might exhaust it, while the Senator from Vermont contended, if I understood him aright, that it had no such tendency.

Mr. COLLAMER. I said it could not by possibility exhaust it; I meant the hiring of substitutes could not exhaust it.

Mr. HOWE. To exhaust the basis of draft, to exhaust the resources from which a draft can be made, is injurious to the Government. To reduce it may not be so directly injurious to the Government, but it is injurious to that portion of the people liable to draft. Let me suggest the practical operation of this amendment. Suppose the whole military reserve borne upon the roll to be nine hundred thousand; that is to say, the whole number who can actually be compelled under the draft to serve in the Army is nine hundred thousand. Suppose a call is made for three hundred thousand and they are drawn and they go into the Army, the reserve then is six hundred thousand; and if another draft is ordered for three hundred thousand more, every man of the reserve stands one chance in two of being drawn. That is the operation of it. Now, suppose instead of the whole three hundred thousand going into the Army under the draft none of them go, but they pay $300 apiece, and with the $300 the Government hires three hundred thousand substitutes. Then the whole number of the reserve is just three hundred thousand. Three hundred thousand are exempt from draft because they are in the service; three hundred thousand are exempt from draft because they have paid $300 each; in other words, they have furnished the means with which to buy three hundred thousand substitutes. Then if the President is obliged to make another call for three hundred thousand it inevitably must take every man of the reserve. That seems to me to be the effect of the operation.

It is said we can afford this, that the resources of the country are actually inexhaustible. I think we overestimate them. We have a large population, to be sure. It is said the whole number borne upon the rolls is a little over three millions. A draft has recently been made of four hundred and fifty thousand. It is said that it turns out that one third of those drafted are not liable to do duty, are entitled to exemption because of physical disability, and another third because of alienage. If that holds true as an average of the whole number on the roll, if two-thirds are exempt for these causes, you really have but a million who can be made to do duty under the draft, if these figures furnish us a correct basis of calculation. If your whole reserve is but a million, I think it ought to be guarded, jealously guarded.

It has been said here, in the course of this debate, that if you will fill up the Army you now have in the field, if you fill up the call made by the President last fall, you will never have to make another call or another draft. Sir, I want to say here that I distrust all such suggestions, let them come from what source they may. I think that from the time the first call of seventy-five thousand was made down to the last call of three hundred thousand, we have been betrayed by just such suggestions that a limited number of men will do this work. Sir, instead of trusting the protection of our flag and the defense of our Union to an army of a fixed number and an army composed of a given number of brigades or of divisions, I would have made a crusade of it from the beginning. It seems to me that I would have armed the loyal people of the United States and let them have met in hostile array the disloyal. Really the issue is made up, not between Government and government, but between people and people, between one style of civilization and another. They admitted that you could outvote them, but they thought they could outfight you, and it seems to me that on every field where we have met the enemy I would have met them by an army which should have illustrated the numbers of the loyal people of the United States, and I think we ought to begin now to do so, and I distrust these suggestions that you can wind this thing up with a given number of men. The sooner we get over that idea the sooner I think we shall begin to approach the end. I really cannot see that we can afford to adopt the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, for it does seem to me that we are, if not exhausting directly the basis of the draft, squandering it in a manner that we cannot prudently afford to do.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, before we have a vote on this question, what is the probable number of colored soldiers now in the service, or that are likely to be in the service under the attempted organizations which I understand are being made under the authority of the War Department. I should like to know whether or not any steps have been taken to enroll the colored men in what are known as the "border States," and if so, when those steps were inaugurated.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, it is not in my power to answer precisely the question put by the Senator from Iowa. I understand that we have fifty thousand colored troops enlisted. It may be that we have increased that number considerably within the last two or three weeks; but it was understood about the time of the meeting of Congress, some four weeks ago, that we had about fifty thousand men. We are increasing them now at a more rapid rate than at any other period, for the reason that we can reach them better. We have for the last few weeks been doing well in Maryland. We are doing well in eastern Virginia. General Butler told me the other day that since he had entered his department he had raised about three thousand. We are doing fairly in Missouri, but not so well as we ought to do there. We are raising colored men in Tennessee and in some other parts of the country. The Government has not pressed this matter of raising black troops with so much vigor as some of us think it ought to have done; but there has been great difficulty in reaching these people. They have been moved away and kept out of the reach of our armies as far as possible. They have now found their way in, and we are enlisting them. I think that as our armies advance we shall raise many more of them; and I am sure that the policy of the Government now being fixed, and the public sentiment demanding it, every effort will be made to enlist colored troops; for, sir, if there be anything in the prosecution of this war that the people are in favor of, it is the raising of black troops to fight the battles of our country. Everybody now demands it. I do not believe that there are five thousand men in New England to-day opposed to it; I do not know of anybody.

Mr. ANTHONY. At this point, with the Senator's permission, I would like to ask a question in regard to the enlistment of colored troops. I have been told, on what I cannot doubt is reliable authority, that the military authorities will not permit freedmen who come into this District to go out of it, and that there are many of them here now who are desirous of going into such States as offer remunerative bounties, and that they are not permitted to leave the city, but are kept here precisely as colored men were kept here under the old slave laws. I can well understand why the Government might properly interfere to prevent the negroes or white people who are residents of this District, enrolled and liable to do military duty here, from going into other States and enlisting, but I cannot understand by what authority, by what law, a free man in this District cannot leave it at his own pleasure, who is not liable to military duty in the District; and if he comes from without the District and is not enrolled in it, he is certainly not liable to military duty here.

Mr. WILSON. I have heard the same complaints as are made to-day by the Senator from Rhode Island. I believe such authority is assumed here in this District. It is an unlawful assumption of authority, and there is no justice in it, and it ought to be abandoned immediately.

Mr. CLARK. By whom has it been assumed?

Mr. WILSON. By the military authorities here, or rather, perhaps, the city authorities. I saw the other day that the Mayor of this city made an appeal to the War Office in regard to it, urging that colored persons should not be permitted to go out of this city into other parts of the country to enlist. I think all this interruption that we have had here at the railroad is wrong, and it ought to be abandoned.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him if the suggestion of the Mayor of the city was not sanctioned by the War Department? I think they approved it, and issued orders about it.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know certainly whether the War Department, as a Department, approved of it or not, but I find practically the thing is done.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have understood that it was under orders of the War Department.

Mr. WILSON. Whether it is approved of by the War Department or not, I do not agree to the policy. I think that any free man who comes into this city, or any person in this city, black or white, who chooses to go anywhere in the country and enlist in the service, should have the privilege of doing so.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] put another question; and that is, whether the Government has enrolled the colored men in the border States. I understand that in Maryland they have done so; I believe they have done it in Kentucky; I speak now of the freedmen, not the slaves. I am told that that is the case. I do not know certainly whether it be so or not. At any rate, there is no doubt that the Government has the power to do it. I am told that in the State of Maryland the Government is enlisting slaves without asking the consent of their masters, and they have the same privilege in the State of Missouri; but I am told that this is not so in the State of Kentucky. The Government can go into any part of the country and take our sons and enlist them without asking our consent, but the Government of the United States cannot step into the great State of Kentucky and enlist a slave without asking the consent of his master. Sir, I would enlist him if I chose to do so, and ask no consent of the master anywhere. The Government can take your son or an apprentice belonging to you without your consent, but it must ask a slavemaster for his consent to enlist an able-bodied man into the service of the country. It is a thing which ought not to be submitted to a day, and it ought not to be acted upon a day longer.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the Senator to inform me, if he can, under what authority the War Department pays the master of the slave where he is enlisted?

Mr. WILSON. I cannot answer the Senator from Missouri, unless it be that they construe the law giving authority to use the money received from persons who have been drafted for exemptions from service to authorize its appropriation in this way. I understand that the War Department had used the $300 or had promised it to the master in certain cases where the slave enlisted into the service because it guarantees to the slave his freedom. In order, I suppose, to fill up the ranks of the Army, and at the same time encourage the emancipation of the slaves, and do it without trouble, the Government decided to pay the master the $300 instead of paying it to the slave. I suppose that to be the motive of the action of the Government.

Mr. BROWN. I merely desired to know whether there was any authority for it in any part of the country.

Mr. WILSON. There is no express law for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to suggest that I think the law is clear enough. The Secretary of War has a right under the enrollment law to use the commutation money to procure substitutes. The language of the law is that it is "for the procurement of substitutes." The Secretary of War has clearly the power to use that money in procuring substitutes, and the law makes no distinction between white and black.

Mr. BROWN. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether there is any law that recognizes the ownership of the master in the slave?

Mr. WILSON. No law of the Federal Government.

Mr. BROWN. If not, on what authority is the amount paid to the master rather than to the slave? I desire information on this question.

Mr. SHERMAN. The law gives to the Secretary of War the power to procure substitutes, and I suppose he can pay the money to any person, black or white, procuring the substitute. If the master's consent is necessary by the local law, he can pay it to the master, so that he procures a substitute. There is no legal difficulty in the way.

Mr. WILSON. Passing from that subject, I wish to say a single word, while I am up, to the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe.] I think if the Senator will examine the amendment he will see that it is just. A person is drafted and he obtains a substitute. It is proposed by the Senator from Ohio that if the substitute is himself liable to be drafted, and shall be drafted, then the person procuring the substitute shall take the place of the drafted substitute, so as to keep the enrollment list full, and the man furnishing that substitute has to go in the Army for the time for which the person is drafted. Now, I propose in this amendment to put the person who furnishes the money on the same footing, and provide that he shall not be liable to be drafted until the enrollment has been exhausted. It seems to me that this is just; that it keeps the enrollment list full all the time. When a man is drafted and pays the $300, and the Government takes that $300 and hires a substitute, perhaps obtains a man not liable to draft, takes one of the old soldiers in the Army by adding to the $300 the $100 now allowed by law, pays him $400, and reenlists him for three years, is it just to draft the person who has thus paid the $300 while other persons have not been drafted at all? This proposition, therefore, makes him liable when the enrollment list is exhausted. If it be exhausted before the term is out, if it be exhausted in a year, and he has paid his $300,

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 14, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 11.

then, though the Government may have obtained a person for three years in his place, he is liable and may be drafted within twelve months. I think, with this explanation, the Senator will be satisfied.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator just explain one thing? It strikes me, and I want to get over that difficulty if I can, that if three hundred thousand of those who are drafted, instead of going into the service pay the commutation money, and with that the Government hires one hundred thousand soldiers who are liable to the draft, then the reserve is reduced by two hundred thousand, whereas, if they went into the service, or if they procured substitutes not liable to draft, the reserve would be reduced by just one hundred thousand; and in that way the payment of this commutation money is a direct injury to everybody whose name still remains on the roll. It increases the liability of those others to be drawn in case of another draft. Is it not so?

Mr. WILSON. There is something in that; but not so much as the Senator makes out of it, by any means.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the chairman of the Military Committee is, I believe, right in saying that the free colored population of Maryland—and I suppose it is the case in the other slave States—are considered as subject to enrollment, and are enrolled. The slave population of my own State is not enrolled; and although, as I had occasion to say the other day, I have no doubt that the Government has the power to call upon the slave population able to bear arms to go into the armies of the United States, it is only because I suppose they are to be considered as men, as persons, within the meaning of the Constitution. They are termed "persons" in that clause of the Constitution which is known as the fugitive clause. For reasons which I think did honor to the framers of the Constitution, the term "slave" found no place in the instrument; but it is historically true, as every member of the Senate must know, that, but for that fugitive clause and the other clause which prohibited to Congress the authority to interfere with the foreign slave trade until twenty years subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution, the Constitution, and the Union which was the result of it, would not have existed, at least would not have existed at that time. The sentiment of the country at that time, I think history will tell us, although opposed to slavery as a permanent institution, was so far settled upon the subject of the impropriety of interfering by legislation through Congress with the right to the slaves as they existed, and of interfering, too, with the right to the increase of the number as far as the number might be increased by means of the foreign slave trade, that the Constitution would not, perhaps, have been adopted but for the provisions on that subject which are found in it, or some equivalent provisions.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. Brown] asks what law there is to justify the Government in paying anything to the masters of slaves who are taken into the service of the United States. It is true that although the term "slave" is nowhere found in the Constitution, slaves are evidently considered as property within the meaning of the fugitive clause and within the meaning of the clause which prohibits to the people of the United States the authority to change the Constitution at all in that particular provision of it which limits the authority of Congress upon the subject of the foreign slave trade to the expiration of twenty years from the adoption of the Constitution. They were considered as property, and were intended as property to be protected by that clause; and they have been considered as property and are now considered as property in your tax laws. So far as the direct tax is concerned they are considered as property. They are considered as property by the laws of all the slave States. They are subjects of distribution; they are liable for the debts of the master; they are subjects of bequests, they are subjects of sale, and are in every respect upon the condition of property; but notwithstanding that, they are no doubt also to be considered as in the character of persons.

I suppose no one will for a moment hesitate in admitting that although they stand in the relation of property in a certain sense they also stand in the relation of persons to the Government, because I suppose every one will admit that they could be guilty of treason as against the United States. If the slaves in the United States were to do as the white men in the southern States have done—I do not mean all the southern States; thank God, I am not obliged to say so—if the slaves in the seceded States had without the consent of the white men risen in rebellion and resisted the laws of the United States by arms, or if they were now found aiding the traitors in the seceded States in their effort by force of arms to destroy the Government of the United States, they might be considered and treated as traitors. In other words, although slaves liable to all the relations growing out of that condition, they are persons owing allegiance to the United States and consequently bound to abstain from everything which is a violation of allegiance; and if they were to go to the extent of levying war upon the United States or of giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States, they might be dealt with as traitors.

But it by no means follows from that that they are not to be esteemed as property, and that the master is not to be paid for them as property. The practice in Maryland—I do not mention it with a view to complain of it now, although I think it is decidedly wrong and has injured the Union feeling in the State much more than Senators are aware of and much more than the country at large is aware of—the practice in Maryland, as I get from sources of information that I know can be relied upon, is that the recruiting officers, white officers, go to the homesteads of the masters, and not only enlist the slave without the consent of the master, but without his own consent. The poor ignorant black man who knows not to what extent the evident power of the Government may be carried, is told that he must enlist, and he enlists under what may be considered and what actually is compulsion. Whether he would enlist (as I think he would in a majority of cases) voluntarily, under the influence of no threat, or under no fear, is a question not submitted to him at all. And not only is that done, but the enlisting officer informs all the slaves upon the plantation, whether able to do duty in the field or not, old men and children and women, that they are all free; and the result has been that the whole of that population which has been able to get off has gone off. That the State will be benefited by the effect of it in the end, I have no doubt; but at the same time it is due to my own convictions of what the Constitution is, and the rights which the people of Maryland have under that Constitution, to protest without meaning to find fault with the Government; to protest, not in any acrimonious sense, against this mode which they have adopted to get the slaves of Maryland in the armies of the United States. I have no objection if it is found necessary, (and of that Congress must judge in the first instance and the Executive afterward,) if it is found necessary in order to put down this rebellion, to call on the slave population to aid us, I have no objection that the call should be made; but I could wish from my heart that it was not necessary, or was not found to be necessary. I could desire, ardently desire, that the white men of the free States and the white men of such of the slave States as are loyal, should be found not only willing but able to put down promptly this rebellion. I have no doubt, and never have had a doubt, that by proper exertion, proper skill in the field, proper foresight on the part of the Executive, proper legislation on the part of Congress, it would have been put down before this; but it is due to the Executive and due to Congress to say that the condition in which they found themselves was a very peculiar one. In the beginning I suppose that neither the Executive nor Congress anti-ipated that this insurrection would assume the dimensions which it has had for the last one or two years. The original call of seventy-five thousand men was supposed at the time to be amply sufficient for the purpose. There have been calls from time to time since of larger numbers, until I suppose we have now in the field, of more than a million men put into the field, some four or five hundred thousand men.

While I am up, I cannot help concurring in the opinion of the Senator from New York, [Mr. HARRIS,] that it will not be necessary to increase the Army to a number beyond the number which it now has. From all the information that I think is in our possession, (independent of what from personal knowledge I cannot help supposing must be the actual condition of the southern States,) they have raised every man that they can raise beneficially, and they have not now in the field more than from two hundred and fifty thousand to three hundred thousand men throughout all the seceded States. While they are so limited in point of numbers, in the men that they are able to keep in the field for a time, it is still more evident that they will not be able long to keep that number in the field, for the want of the means of supporting that number.

Perhaps gentlemen not belonging to a slave State may not have the same means of information with those of us who live in what has been considered a slave State. We have, more or less, in all the southern States now in secession, relations and connections numerous, found all over the South. I speak with reference to the State of Louisiana, of whose condition I was able to judge when there some two years ago upon a mission for the Government, and by information that I have had since of the State of Mississippi, that those two States are now utterly exhausted in everything but the zeal, ardor, and intrepidity of a portion of their population. The men of those States who were parties to a purpose long since formed to break this Union if they could, and the masses whom they succeeded in deluding through their artifices, are men not to succumb easily. As long as the masses are under the delusion to which they have been subjected, they will continue to fight while nature survives; but I believe that the President's proclamation—though far from being such as I think he should have issued and might have issued—is doing already a great deal to restore the Union feeling, and will do still more as the war progresses. Looking to the character of that part of the population who were not parties to the original plan to break up the Union, it is impossible for me to believe that they can be so entirely lost to all the dictates of common sense as not to see that in a struggle with the free and loyal States of the Union the result must be still more fatal to them than it has already proved, and that their only chance of saving anything is to come back under the flag which for so many years protected them, to enjoy the honor which they in common with ourselves so long enjoyed under the protection of that banner, and living under the Union and under the power of the Union, and with the recollection of all the glories of the Union, to restore their States by means of free labor to a state of prosperity and power that they never in the past attained.

Mr. GRIMES. I am very glad, sir, that I addressed the inquiry that I did to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson.] I am rejoiced at the response he has given to it, and I think the country will be glad to know that the Administration has established a policy in regard to the recruitment of colored persons. I have heard for the last twelve months givings-out that such was to be the policy of the Administration, or indeed that it actually was; but the results which have been accomplished have never satisfied me that that was their real genuine intention, for I have always believed that if there had been the proper agencies used, if there had been the proper degree of practical sagacity exhibited by the agents who were selected by the Government to raise colored regiments, there could have been two hundred thousand colored men marshaled into the field to-day, and I believe it now. I believe that there might have been, and ought to have been two hundred thousand colored men in the field at this moment, and that instead of our being compelled to pass a bill appropriating $20,000,000 for bounties, as we have done to-day, and passing a bill to amend the enrollment act, we need not have required a single new white soldier to enter the Army.

The reason why I have judged so is, first, that I have not seen the persons selected to transact this business and to raise these men who have exhibited any great degree of knowledge, or skill, or zeal, in accomplishing their purpose. I should like to know, if such has been the purpose of the Government, how it happens that General Order No. 229, the only general order on the subject that has ever been issued by the War Department, has never been published among the other general orders. That is the general order which relates to the enlistment of colored men. How does it happen that there is so much strictness in inquiry with regard to the capacity and qualifications of officers for colored regiments? If there is not a desire on the part of somebody—I do not say the Administration, and I do not believe it of the Administration—but of somebody who is intrusted by the Administration with the carrying out of their views in this regard, why is it that we have a board of regular military officers before whom every young man is sent who aspires to any particular command in any one of the colored regiments, who is not interrogated as to his capacity to command, as to his ability to maneuver a company, or a battalion, or a regiment, but is interrogated as to the movements of the celestial bodies, interrogations put to him in regard to the most minute and difficult questions of astronomy and mathematics, so that I am told it is almost impossible to find men who are able to pass the examination in order to officer these regiments? Send your major generals and brigadier generals before that board, and subject them to the same examination to which I understand these young men are subjected, and not one in twenty of them can pass the examination. I do not want to judge my fellow Senators here; but permit me to say that, if I understand what that examination is, I will frankly admit that I could not pass it.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Iowa will allow me to inquire of him how he has ascertained the supposed fact that the board to which he refers puts applicants upon their examination in reference to their knowledge of the science of astronomy or any of the higher branches of mathematics. I beg to say to the Senator that I understand the direct contrary from a member of the board, that really the examination is confined to those branches of science and knowledge which are, in their nature, somewhat elementary and simple, certainly does not extend to the science of astronomy. They are interrogated occasionally as to their knowledge of geometry, of arithmetic, of algebra, and other branches of that kind, but I fancy never as to astronomy or any of those higher branches.

I beg to say further to the Senator while I am up, that I have been informed very credibly that since the organization of that board they have examined nearly twelve hundred applicants for commissions in the colored troops, and that out of the number whom they have thus examined, they have recommended only about six hundred, not quite one half of them, and that the rejections have been made by the board on account of the manifest incompetency of the applicants, their want of skill and knowledge in the simple branches of human science to which I have alluded, and in which they are examined. I think the Senator, though not of his own knowledge, is doing injustice to the board to which he refers.

Mr. GRIMES. My knowledge is derived precisely as the knowledge of the Senator from Michigan is. His is hearsay; so is mine. He has his information from members of the board, and I have my information from persons who stood before the board and were examined.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And rejected.

Mr. GRIMES. Some of them were rejected and some not. Furthermore, I have seen it so published in the newspapers, and I have never seen any contradiction from anybody connected with the Administration.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me a word?

Mr. GRIMES. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire simply to say to the Senator from Iowa and to the Senate that I possess some more exact knowledge in regard to the examinations and the mode of conduct before that board than the Senator evidently does. I know that the Senator would not misrepresent any person or any fact. I understand that perfectly; but I beg to say for his information and that of the Senate, that the direct contrary of the statement which he has been induced to make is the fact; and in proof of it, the examinations have been so conducted with regard to the capacity of the candidates to take care of their men, to understand the proper keeping of their muster-rolls and their accounts, the immediate duties necessary by them to be performed, that the board have found the most efficient and fit men, and given the highest commissions to sergeants and privates who generally knew little of astronomy, little of the movements of the spheres, but very much, having been taught in their capacities, of the treatment and management and necessary discipline of men. I can assure the Senator that the statement I make is well founded, and that he will ascertain it to be true; and it is due to that board, than whom a better one in my opinion cannot be constructed, that the statement should be so made here.

Mr. GRIMES. I may have been entirely misinformed. The information which I have derived may be altogether false. The Senator from California has not told us the means of information that he has, but doubtless his knowledge is derived in the same manner as the Senator from Michigan derived his, from members of that board; but you will recollect that the Senator from Michigan states that these applicants are examined in geometry, questions of Euclid are submitted to them, and questions in algebra are submitted to them, and if they do not understand exactly the equations in algebra I suppose of course they are rejected; else why are those questions put to them?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not understand that they are rejected in consequence of their defective knowledge either of algebra or geometry. Some questions relating to those branches of science are put to the applicants; but I fancy that the examination is not perfectly thorough.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not pretend to know the particular specific ground upon which they reject applicants; but I think it would be a fair inference that if a man went before that board and did not understand either algebra or geometry, they would reject him; else why do they put the questions to him?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will allow me to explain why those questions are put I will state what was told me by one of the board, a very able officer, in whom I have very great confidence. When candidates present themselves before them—they are desirous of getting competent officers—they examine them only (unless they request to go to a higher grade) in precisely what it is necessary that they should understand—tactics, the management of troops, &c.—things absolutely essential. But if they present themselves for higher grades after they get through, and wish to be examined further, the board, considering that even in an officer general information, general intelligence, good education, an acquaintance with the higher branches does no harm, very frequently go on, after satisfying themselves in regard to the particulars necessary for a lower command, to ask general questions on other matters; but not at all unless they themselves desire it, and in those cases they have done so.

My friend from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] has just told me one fact in regard to it, that in one regiment, the tenth Vermont regiment, they took seven privates who presented themselves for examination and they were made officers from their fitness. It was remarked to me—I will not say by whom, but by one who knew—that so far as the examinations had gone, it had become quite evident that a very considerable portion of the education, to say the least of it, and the ability of the Army was in the rank and file, in the sergeants and the privates. One circumstance was stated to me—I do not know that I can now give it to the Senate exactly as I heard it, though I afterward saw it stated in the newspapers: on one day a man who was a major or a lieutenant colonel presented himself for examination for the same rank, and there was a captain who presented himself, and two lieutenants and a sergeant presented themselves. The board examined all of them. Their idea was to recommend men for particular grades according as they went through the examination. They were desired to go as far as they pleased, and were very thorough. They rejected the major for everything; they rejected the captain, did not find him fit even for a lieutenant; the first lieutenant who presented himself they made a second lieutenant; and the sergeant they made a lieutenant colonel, and that upon the examination. The idea of that board is that it would be a good thing—it is done abroad—to subject our Army, not only those who present themselves as officers for colored troops, but as officers for white troops, the whole of them, to a board of examination and let them go through regularly, and not take them as they happen to come and because they happen to be particularly educated; and to pursue the same course if we enlarge our regular Army.

I had this statement from one of the board in whom I have entire confidence. The stories that are told about examinations in astronomy, &c., come, probably, from men who, having been rejected and found utterly unfit for officers, tell these stories about the questions that were put to them. It is very natural, perhaps, that they should do so.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, we are constantly learning; we are deriving a good deal of information, and I trust that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and his subordinates will learn something from this debate, and that to-morrow they will introduce a bill by which there shall be a change made, and by which the valuable officers assigned to the colored regiments shall be given to our white boys, and the poor officers now in command of the white regiments shall be assigned to the colored regiments, for it seems that the colored regiments are always to be kept in camp, and not to go into the field.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is not the fault of the board of examination.

Mr. GRIMES. I am talking about the course of the Administration in this regard. As it seems to be the policy of the Government to keep the colored men in camp and not send them into the field, it would appear to be important that those who go into the field should have the services of the valuable, experienced, and well-educated officers who have passed this board of examination. I trust we shall have a bill to-morrow from my friend the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs making this modification in the organization of the Army at once. If the Senator from Maine is correct in that regard, I think the public necessities require that these officers should be transferred to the white regiments.

Mr. President, I was merely assigning reasons why I was gratified at the enunciation of the Senator from Massachusetts that there was a change in the opinions of the War Department on this question, and that they were honestly intending hereafter to enlist colored regiments. I trust that there will be some effort from this time forward to raise colored regiments in the State of Missouri. It is only a few months since there was an effort made to raise a colored regiment in that State, and yet they were thwarted in it by authorities who had control there, so that they were obliged to make the rendezvous of the regiment in my State, in the town of Keokuk. I think that was within the last four or five months, and my colleague concurs in that opinion. I am gratified, I say, and I know that my constituents will be gratified and the whole country will be gratified at the announcement made by the Senator from Massachusetts that from this time forward we are to have an earnest, persistent, energetic effort on the part of the Government to enlist colored men into our service.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if there is any law in force or does this bill provide for enrolling negro troops in Kentucky? Before he answers the question I propose to send to the Secretary's table a Kentucky newspaper which contains a couple of advertisements that I ask the Secretary to read; that the Senate may know what they are doing with colored materiel in that State.

The Secretary read the following advertisements from the Kentucky Commonwealth of Monday, January 4, 1864:

NOTICE.

There was committed to the Carroll county jail, as a runaway slave, a negro man calling himself Ed. Williams. He is about five feet eight or nine inches high, light complexion, nineteen years of age, had on when taken up a striped cassimere box coat, black felt hat, and gray mixed pants, and in his possession an oil cloth and blanket, marked with the letters U. S. He was taken from the steamer Prima Donna, at the wharf at Carrollton, Carroll county, Kentucky. Says he belongs to Park Townsend, of Huntsville, Alabama.

The owner can come forward, prove property, and pay charges, or he will be dealt with as the law requires.

DAVID OWEN, J. C. C.

December 17, 1863.

NOTICE.

There was committed to the jail of Harrison county, as a runaway slave, a negro boy calling himself John. He is about seventeen years of age, weighs about one hundred and fifty pounds, copper color, about five feet nine inches high. Says he belongs to Brown Paton, of Alabama.

The owner can come forward, prove property, and pay charges, or he will be dealt with as the law requires.

JOHN BRUCE, J. H. C.

December 7, 1863.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have a desk-full of newspapers that are full of advertisements of that sort. While slavery is dying out in Maryland and Missouri, in Kentucky it seems to be gaining strength. It is a fact known to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Brown] and to myself that they are running slaves from Missouri into Kentucky. Some provision should be made, it seems to me, by Congress for enlisting negroes in Kentucky if there is no such law now in force.

I desire to notice a statement made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Grimes] as to the progress made by the Government in the organizing of negro troops. I had the honor of organizing the first regiment of negro troops in this war. They were raised in the anti-slavery State of Kansas. We were four months preparing public sentiment in that anti-slavery State before we dared to show our Ironsides to the people. The public sentiment of the North had to be educated for negro troops; old prejudices had to be removed or modified; and it does seem to me that in the organization of negro troops the Government has made all the progress that public sentiment would permit; sagaciously making haste slowly on this subject; not leading but closely following public opinion.

I desire also to make a statement as to the board for the examination of officers for colored troops. I suppose the Senator from Iowa alludes to the board here of which General Casey is the president. I have recommended as many persons for examination by that board as any other Senator. Every single one of those that I have recommended has passed that board. A young man came from Kansas last week who had been in the service one campaign. I recommended him to the board, and he passed at once, and has his commission now. I remember another instance of a recommendation of a private soldier who had been in the regular Army for nine years—a private in the ranks for nine years. I recommended him, and he passed at once. I differ with the Senator from Iowa as to where the well-qualified officers should serve. It seems to me that negro troops should have the best officers that we can furnish them—officers of talent, officers of education, anti-slavery officers, who will sympathize with the men under their command. I do hope, having seen the manner in which the people of Kentucky are treating as good materiel in my opinion as any other, that the chairman of the Military Committee, if the Government is not prepared to seize the slaves of Kentucky and force them into the ranks, will propose a law for that purpose. In my opinion all the black men, free and slave, should be exhausted before white men are drafted.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, in the State of Maryland we have raised a large number of men under the lead of General Birney, a son of James G. Birney, who inherits the principles of his father, and who is one of the most devoted and faithful officers we have in the service of the United States. He has officered those regiments from men who have passed before this board, and in my judgment, derived from the information given by him and by others, no regiments in the service have been better officered. In General Butler's department, he said to me the other day that he had raised since he went there, only a few weeks ago, three thousand colored men. They had some raised there before; General Wilde had raised a brigade in North Carolina. General Wilde belongs to that class of men who know what this war is about, and whose heart is in it. He believed in raising these troops, and he had them well officered. We are raising in the State of Tennessee a large number of men, because there we have the influence of Andrew Johnson, who is for raising these troops and for making Tennessee what she ought to be, a free State. Down in the department of the Gulf we have raised probably twenty thousand black men, and we have officered them as best we could; perhaps they are not so well officered there as the regiments nearer the city of Washington, whose officers have passed through an examination before this board. Still we are improving there; and everywhere in the country, with possibly the exception of the States of Missouri and Kentucky, the raising of colored troops is progressing finely.

Mr. HENDERSON. With the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts, I will state that in the State of Missouri now, under the order made by General Schofield under the direction of the President, the negroes, as I understand, are being very rapidly enrolled; at least in my particular section of the State. I hear some complaints in regard to it from other sections; but in my section of the State my information is that there will scarcely be any able-bodied negroes left.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that to be the case in regard to portions of Missouri, and in fact I suppose we are making some progress there, though perhaps not as much as we ought to make. I received to-day a letter from a surgeon in the United States service in which he says: "I wish to call your attention to outrages perpetrated on the negro recruits at this post;" (that is, Benton barracks;) "they are harassed and annoyed by conservative copperhead provost marshals and other Government officers before they arrive here." Then he says the proper care is not taken of them there, and recommends that certain things shall be done. I placed the letter this morning in the hands of the Secretary of War, to see the suggestions there made, which I think very good ones.

Now, sir, a word in regard to Kentucky. The Senator asks if the Government has enrolled the colored men of Kentucky. I cannot answer the question, although I have understood that the Government has enrolled the free colored men of Kentucky. In our law we provided for the enrollment of "citizens," and perhaps the Secretary of War had doubts in regard to the construction of that term. I have none. I believe that the native-born slave in this country is as much a citizen as any member of the Senate of the United States. I have not a doubt on that point.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Has not the Supreme Court decided differently?

Mr. WILSON. The Supreme Court made a decision which I do not choose at this time to go into, the effect of which was to rule a man out of court. That is all they did, as I understand. The Attorney General of the United States has decided that a black man is a citizen if he is free; and he does not raise the question if he is a slave. I take it that neither the Attorney General nor any other lawyer can show any reason why a black man, whether a slave or not, is not a citizen, any more than he can show why a man who is twenty-two years old is a citizen and a man who is twenty is not a citizen. However, I will pass by that question.

Little has been done in the State of Kentucky, for the reason that Kentucky to-day is the only State in the Union that maintains the cause of slavery or carries its flag. Delaware has taken her position; Maryland has taken hers; and so have West Virginia and Missouri. Tennessee, which was excepted from the proclamation of freedom, is taking her position under the influence of Andrew Johnson and the patriotic men of that State. But, sir, Kentucky passed into the hands of a conservative class of politicians, who started in the first place to hold her in a neutral position, where she could dictate terms to the country. They undertook then to dictate to the President, but they failed, and now they are denouncing him. That class of politicians, however, is passing away, even in Kentucky. The people are ripening there as they are ripening everywhere else; and when the next opportunity comes for Kentucky to speak, I entertain not the shadow of a doubt that she will speak by an overwhelming majority, just as Missouri and Maryland and Delaware and West Virginia have spoken. I think the Government has dealt rather tenderly in not enlisting colored men in that State. If I had the power I would enlist every black free man who was willing to enlist and every slave who was willing to enlist, and ask no leave of Kentucky politicians or of slavemasters in Kentucky, but I would put them into the service at once.

Now, sir, a word in regard to this board. General Casey is chairman of the board, and I say to the Senator from Iowa what I know to be the fact, that a more true, loyal, faithful man does not bear the commission of the United States than General Casey. He is in favor of enlisting black troops, and was early in favor of it. He is in favor of giving them good officers, men qualified to command, men of personal character and individual honor. I do not entertain a doubt that the men who have passed that board are better fitted for their places than are the officers of the average white regiments of the country. I know that General Casey believes that the colored troops ought to have better officers than white troops, that they ought to have men whose sympathies are with them, who will treat them kindly, but firmly, men of intelligence and of character qualified for their positions, and I know that he has striven to give them such officers. I wish all the colored troops in the country were as well officered as the troops are whose officers have passed before the board presided over by this man, in whose character, in whose devotion to the country I have as much confidence as in any man who is bearing the commission of the United States.

I do not believe there is any change in the head of the War Department. I know it is fashionable to denounce Mr. Stanton, and to complain of him everywhere. He came into that office with a vehement, intense, and passionate devotion to prosecuting the war and breaking down the rebellion. He has labored with an industry and zeal unsurpassed. He may have decided questions sometimes without due examination. He is a man of great vigor and promptitude, and may sometimes have acted with haste; but I have ever found him willing to correct a mistake when he had made it, or to right a wrong when he had committed it; and I believe the time is coming, and that it is not far distant, when the American people will acknowledge a debt of gratitude to the vigor, the knowledge, and the fidelity of Edwin M. Stanton.

Sir, I see that the hour of four o'clock has arrived; I had hoped we should finish this bill to-day, but I now think we shall not be able to do so. I wish to have a short executive session which I said to be important; but before moving that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business I offer an amendment to this bill which I ask the Senate to have printed that we may have it before us to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also desire to submit an amendment that it may be printed.

The proposed amendments were received informally, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (No. 65) to change the place of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of West Tennessee, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO A MEMBER.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to what I believe to be a question of privilege. My colleague, Mr. HARRINGTON, is necessarily obliged to be absent during the present week on pressing business. I move that he have leave of absence until Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMEASUREMENT OF VESSELS, ETC.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of amending the law of 1799 in regard to the admeasurement of vessels; and also of providing by law a punishment of masters and owners of vessels for changing their names, and similar fraudulent practices; and also amending the revenue act of July 14, 1862, and other acts on the same subject.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order to be the call of committees for reports.

RAILROAD TO NEW YORK.

Mr. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back a memorial in relation to more speedy railroad communication between the cities of Washington and New York, and asked that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the special committee on that subject. It was so ordered.

COURTS IN WESTERN TENNESSEE.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with amendments, a bill (H. R. No. 65) to change the places of holding the circuit and district courts for the district of Western Tennessee, and for other purposes; and moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

JURISDICTION OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. WILSON also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 66) concerning the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims.

The bill was read. It enacts that the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or appropriation of or damage to property by the Army or Navy, except in such cases as may, by special resolution of either House of Congress, be referred to said court for adjudication.

The amendment was to strike out the words "except in such cases as may, by special resolution of either House of Congress, be referred to said court for adjudication."

Mr. WILSON moved the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. The object of this bill is to retain in the hands of Congress the adjudication of claims growing out of damages done to property by our troops in the progress of this war. There is some danger of this jurisdiction being assumed by the Court of Claims. I understand that the question is already there; and in order that the jurisdiction may be held by Congress until some general plan is devised for the settlement of such claims as the Government should settle, this bill is reported. I move, the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. Has the bill been printed?

Mr. WILSON. No.

Mr. STEVENS. It is a very important bill, and I hope it will be allowed to go over and be printed. It strikes me that the bill is not such a one as I should vote for.

Mr. WILSON. The bill consists of only three or four lines, and is very easily comprehended. I think it important that this matter should be settled now, before claims accumulate, and before the Treasury of the Government is embarrassed to a greater extent, perhaps, by these claims than by all the expenses of the Army and Navy. It merely reserves the question to Congress; providing that the Court of Claims shall not have that jurisdiction.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I hope that this bill will be allowed to go over, so that we may have an opportunity of examining the law of the matter. It is a very important question. I am not sure but that persons are legitimately entitled to be paid for the losses sustained by them in consequence of the acts of our own military authorities during this war, and should be allowed to bring their claims before the Court of Claims as well as if they were claims arising under contracts. I think that this is a very harsh measure toward those who suffer by the acts of our own troops. As to claims for losses inflicted by the enemy, I know very well that they are not to be thought of. But in regard to acts done by our own troops, by order of our own military officers, I see no reason why claims for compensation should be deferred, or why jurisdiction of them should be taken from the Court of Claims. At all events,

I would rather have a little time to think over the matter, and to see the bill in print. Otherwise I shall be obliged to vote against it.

Mr. YEAMAN. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa withdraw the demand for the previous question?

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. YEAMAN. Mr. Speaker, there are many claims, not only of great importance to the parties urging them but of equal justice with any others that may be presented against the Government, the nature of which will make it impossible that they can be investigated by Congress. The majority of the members voting for the bill which was passed at the last session of Congress referred the matter to the decision of the Court of Claims for two reasons: in the first place, to relieve Congress of that immense labor; and secondly, that justice might be done to the claimants. After the passage of that act a doubt was raised, to my utter surprise, whether it conferred that jurisdiction or not on that court.

These claims arise in this way: frequently there is a written contract, but not such as can be recognized by the quartermaster, the commissary, or the paymaster's department under the regulations of the War Department, or there is an irregular or informal receipt or voucher given to parties for goods taken.

Mr. WILSON. If the gentleman from Kentucky will allow me, claims of that nature are provided for in another measure which the Committee on the Judiciary will hereafter report to the House. I mean in reference to the claims upon the quartermaster's department, or the department of the commissary of subsistence.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me say a word.

Mr. COX. We cannot hear on this side of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman refers to other measures. Now, suppose that it is necessary for the Government of the United States to take property for the object of the Army; suppose that the Army batters down and destroys houses which are in the way of military operations, and turns families out of doors; if I understand the gentleman from Iowa, all such questions are to be reserved to some indefinite period in the future. Instead of allowing claims to go before the Court of Claims, and the claimants to take the chance of securing appropriations to pay them by Congress, they are to be put off, for anything that we know, to the death of the parties who are entitled to justice. I cannot recognize anything of that kind. I am not ready for that measure.

I think that this is a harsh measure. I ought to have some modification deliberately made, and we ought not to be called upon to pass at once a bill of three lines, involving the comforts and rights of thousands of our people who are now suffering. It is hasty legislation.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has any right to complain of what he may term hasty action on bills of this kind. I think that many important measures coming from the Committee of Ways and Means are acted on, to say the least, with considerable haste. But let that pass. I want to go to the merits of this question.

Mr. Speaker, when we understand the history of this question, I think there ought to be no hesitancy on the part of the House in the adoption of the pending bill. The Judiciary Committee of the Thirty-Seventh Congress did not believe that they were conferring upon the Court of Claims jurisdiction in the cases referred to by this bill, and it is now a question, I understand, whether the Court of Claims will assume it. It is probable, however, that they will assume jurisdiction. I know that the Committee on the Judiciary of the Thirty-Seventh Congress did not believe that they were recommending the passage of an act that would confer that jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims. This bill will simply place the law as the committee of the last Congress intended that it should be. Nor will it change what I apprehend was the belief of the House as to the effect of that bill amending the law concerning the establishment of the Court of Claims. It is impossible to pass any law in relation to the questions growing out of the progress of this war that will not work hardship in some cases. But the question here is whether the House will leave this whole matter, involving hundreds of millions of dollars, to the Court of Claims, that the Government may now be forced to adjustment and settlement, or whether we will wait until we can determine some general system by which justice may be done to the claimants who should be paid by the Government. When we come to examine these claims we shall find that many are now pressed upon the Government for adjustment and settlement which have never been recognized at any period by any Government. For the purpose of reserving these questions until Congress can devise some scheme for the adjustment of all that should be adjusted, the committee have directed me to report this bill. I therefore feel disposed to press this bill on the House at this time. If the House shall determine that this jurisdiction shall be conferred upon the Court of Claims and the Treasury burdened beyond what it can bear, the responsibility is not with me.

Mr. YEAMAN. In reply to the remark made by the able chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, I make this suggestion: this bill says that property taken or appropriated by the Army or Navy shall not be adjudicated in the Court of Claims. The Constitution says that the property of citizens shall not be taken without just compensation. Yet it is taken, and it is declared upon the face of this bill that we shall have no remedy in the courts of the country.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman will allow me to correct him. The bill provides simply that the Court of Claims shall not have jurisdiction in the classes of cases mentioned in the bill. It does not deprive citizens of any of the other remedies which they have heretofore had.

Mr. YEAMAN. By the bill, the claims are left, not upon the law of the case, but upon the will of the House, which has never time to investigate them.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the House will not proceed now to pass this bill. As my colleague and the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania remarked, there is a large number of claims held by the people against the Government which are just, and we want some tribunal which can decide upon the validity of those claims. If, through inadvertence, jurisdiction was given to the Court of Claims by the last Congress, why not let it remain until Congress shall provide some other tribunal to which all these matters may be referred? When that is done, you can deprive the Court of Claims of this jurisdiction. Let the jurisdiction remain, and in case Congress shall fail to provide some other tribunal for adjudication, we shall have a court to which we can go.

I hope for that reason the House will not vote for the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON. I now renew the demand for the previous question; and upon that I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WILSON and ELDRIDGE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, nays 39.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. STEVENS. As the bill is not open to amendment, I move to lay it upon the table; and upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Hall, Herriek, Holman, William Johnston, Kalbfleisch, Kelley, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Orin, Perry, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Scott, Smith, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Siles, Strouse, Sweet, Webster, Whaley, Wheelwright, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Driggs, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Gan-on, Goehs, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Julian, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Lazar, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Pendleton, Perham, Pike, Comstock, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Schenck, Seafield, Shannon, Smithers, Spalding, Stebbins, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—82.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. UPSON announced that Mr. BEAMAN was detained from the House by illness.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. With a view to allow the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to offer a verbal amendment, which is perhaps material to the accomplishment of the purposes of the bill, I move to reconsider the vote ordering the previous question.

Mr. WILSON. I merely wish to state to the House that I hope that will not be done. While I do not think that the point made by the gentleman from Ohio lies against the bill, still I may state that the same objection covered by the amendment the gentleman proposes, is involved in another bill which the committee is now considering. The object of this bill is only to keep the matter in the hands of Congress until it can be set right by more complete investigation. I therefore hope we will pass the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have not made any point.

Mr. WILSON. I made my remark upon what was stated to me by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. SCHENCK. I prefer that the vote should be reconsidered in order to afford an opportunity to make this bill better, to say the least, than it is as it now stands, and I prefer not to await some other probable legislation to take place upon some other proposition before the House to amend what seems to be a very fatal defect in this bill.

This bill, the House must have observed, provides that there shall be no jurisdiction taken in cases where property has either been destroyed or injured or appropriated for the use of the Army. Now every one knows that it is the common practice to appropriate property; and, where there is no money in the hands of the quartermaster, to give certificates of indebtedness, and those are outstanding claims justly against the Government. This bill, it seems to me, is too sweeping. While I agree with the gentleman that we ought to cut off from the Court of Claims any construction of the law under which that court was organized, which will give the court a right to look at questions of tort, of wrong, of incidental damage, we ought not to make our legislation so broad as to cut off the consideration of such cases as these I have referred to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would inquire if the law does not now authorize the payment of claims for property appropriated by the Army for which certificates have been given by quartermasters?

Mr. PENDLETON. I shall object to further debate unless the previous question is reconsidered, so that the debate may be open to all.

Mr. WILSON. I hope it will not be reconsidered. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Garfield, Hall, Harding, Herriek, William Johnston, Kalbfleisch, Kelley, King, Knapp, Law, Lazar, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orin, Pendleton, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scott, Smith, Spalding, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Siles, Strouse, Sweet, Webster, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Gauson, Goehs, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Loan, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Norton, Odell, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Seafield, Shannon, Smithers, Stebbins, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—71.

So the vote ordering the main question was reconsidered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed joint resolution H. R. No. 15, to provide for printing the annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and joint resolution H. R. No. 16, to continue the bounties heretofore paid.

MEMBER SWORN IN.

Mr. WEBSTER. I rise to a question of privilege. One of the members elect from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] is present, and is ready to take the oath of office.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, appeared and took the oath of office prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

JURISDICTION OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The question recurred upon ordering the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I am in favor of this bill so far as I have been enabled to discover what its contents are in the brief period that has been allowed for its consideration, but I do not believe in the principle of putting bills through under the whip and spur which involve as serious consequences as does the one now under consideration. If forced to vote upon the bill now, I shall certainly vote in favor of it, because I believe the general principle is correct; but I think we should have it printed, and have time to consider it. I therefore move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed.

Mr. SCHENCK. While I was on the floor before, Mr. Speaker, I sent to the Clerk's desk an amendment which, if read now, will indicate the view which I have in desiring to have this bill laid over for further consideration. I ask to have it read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Add to the bill the words "except in cases sounding in contract, where material, food, forage, or other property for the actual use of the Government has been taken, and certificates or other evidences of indebtedness in writing from some proper authority given therefor."

Mr. SCHENCK. I am going to vote, Mr. Speaker, for the reference of this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, unless its friends will agree to have it amended in the House. I am not willing to trust that some future legislation even by this Congress will amend defects which seem to be apparent in this bill itself. I prefer, if possible, to have this bill perfected as a whole, leaving other legislation on other points involved in the same general question to come up in its turn and be considered on its own merits.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he intends by his amendment to cover any claims against the Government except those which come from the quartermaster's and commissary departments?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir. The engineers may have taken timber. I intend to cover all the cases where material, food, forage, or other property, has been actually taken and used for the purpose of the Army. Contracts are sometimes defective; forms are sometimes not such as to carry the claim through the Department and have allowance made. I am not willing to close the doors of the Court of Claims or of any other tribunal against the fair consideration of claims for such materials actually used by the Government in the prosecution of this war. I have another purpose, which will show why I prefer to take this position now. I am told that there will be a bill introduced providing for some sort of departmental court or tribunal which shall take into consideration all questions of tort, all claims for damages of every kind done to property during the progress of this war, in order that proper allowance may be made. I understand that some such bill is likely to be introduced.

Mr. WILSON. I know nothing about that.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well. I will develop what I consider to be the proper policy on this subject. I hold that all these claims sounding in contract, all these instances where property, material, subsistence, has been actually taken, and where the Government has had the benefit of it, ought to be paid for. Under the rules of the court they will be paid for only to loyal claimants. But they ought to be paid for. I do not hold that it is safe for us to attempt to go any further. I know that there is a vast number of cases that will arise hereafter under claims against the Government for damages done by our Army in its progress. There will be claims for fences burned, for farms tramped over, for crops destroyed, for cattle escaped by reason of fences being let down, for houses occupied, and for innumerable other matters of that general class. I am not in favor of anything being done by this Congress in regard to that large class of cases, except to provide some proper tribunal which shall perpetuate the testimony, in order that hereafter when claims are presented there may be some probability of those claims not being excessive or extraordinary. That has been done by military commanders, in many instances, without any direct provision of law. It has happened to myself to have a commission appointed to investigate claims of this sort, and I have in my mind at this moment, as an illustration of the consequences of this, one case where a claim was made for incidental damages to the amount of $1,200, and where the damages were reduced, in a manner which the claimant himself was obliged to admit as fair and just, to thirty-seven dollars.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether his amendment applies to cases where the Government has taken possession of a small tract of land and has built on it fortifications or other works of defense?

Mr. SCHENCK. Such cases have been paid and settled, in the character of rent, by quartermasters; and such cases, I apprehend, will be provided for if the bill be amended as I propose, for here is property actually taken and applied to the use of the Government. That would be my answer to the gentleman. But as to that wide extent of claims which will be heaped up mountain high against this Government for ground simply trodden over, for ground encamped upon, for timber incidentally destroyed, for horses let loose, for fences burned, if you open the door to cases of that kind, you will bankrupt the Treasury before you get through the war. And I say plainly and distinctly that, although I admit the justice of many of these claims, but to a much smaller amount and degree than applied for, we ought to postpone the consideration of the whole of them, and use all our means first to put down the rebellion, and pay that part of the cost of it hereafter. Believing that to be the case, I propose to limit the inquiry to matters of contract, where property has been actually taken, used, and enjoyed by the Government, and adjourn inquiry into these other questions until after the rebellion is put down.

Mr. KERNAN. Having concurred in the report of this bill, I desire, very briefly, to state the reasons that operated on my own mind; and I confess that the views expressed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] were those which controlled the majority of the committee, and we supposed we were reporting a bill to carry out those views. They were in favor of paying for property which had been taken and used by the Army. They agreed in the wisdom of the suggestion that he has made, that the Government could not now, in the midst of war, however just might be the claims of one character and another, however hard might be the cases submitted, that the Government could not now provide for the payment of damage to land, for fences destroyed, and other like losses which our people have suffered from the Army.

Now, sir, the present law gives, as I understand, to the Court of Claims jurisdiction in all cases of contract, express or implied. The committee were informed that there would be an effort, and that it might be successful, to have the Court of Claims take jurisdiction in a large class of claims which are not strictly cases of contract, but which might legally be held to be cases where the tort was waived and which might be brought in under the designation of cases of contract. It was deemed proper, therefore, that jurisdiction should be taken from the Court of Claims in that class of cases where property had been taken, where injuries had been suffered, upon the theory that the Government should not now permit itself to be forced to judgment, as was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] Hence this bill simply takes away that jurisdiction, and leaves the Court of Claims still having jurisdiction in cases of contract, express or implied.

The Committee on the Judiciary were also of the opinion and considered at the same session the propriety of providing for the payment of all cases where the Army had taken property and used it for the purposes of subsistence; and a bill was agreed to, and is in the hands of one of the committee to be reported to the House, making provision for the payment of subsistence and quartermaster stores that were taken for the use of the Army; that where property has been taken for the Army and used for its support such cases should be adjusted and paid, not by sending them to the Court of Claims, but to be adjusted and paid at the quartermaster and commissary departments, as they now pay for property which has been taken and for which there are regular certificates or vouchers. We believed that that provision would guard the country against fraud. The committee believed that we had better permit, better for the claimants and better for the Government, such cases where the Government took property, hay, oats, flour, &c., to subsidize the Army—and regular certificates were not given, I understand, in a great many cases—to be adjusted and settled as is provided in the other bill which will be reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and which I presume will be passed by this House.

In this way we provide that these claims shall not be sent to the Court of Claims, to suffer there what claims do suffer there; but that claims for subsistence and quartermaster stores shall be adjusted and settled by the proper officers of the commissary department and the quartermaster's department. We believed that they would guard the Government from fraud, as they know all of the ways of fraud; that they would better guard the Government than by any other way that could be devised. Therefore, sir, I concurred in both of these bills. We agreed that they should be brought in separately. I think that the House, on reflection, will find the passage of this bill is right in itself; and the other bill will provide for that class of cases where property has been taken and used for the Army.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I believe that at least it is proper for the Congress of the United States to determine now its policy as to claims against the Government which may hereafter come up for adjustment and settlement. I believe that it is the duty of Congress at this session to pass a law by which every man under the Government who has been injured in any way, even to the smallest item, shall be made to feel that the Government of the United States intends to pay that debt. Now, sir, it was the first step of the session when this war broke out that every claim for property taken for the advancement of the Army in the suppression of the rebellion should be paid, and paid as the Army moved along. In consequence, however, of the latitude of this war, detachments of the Army have been sent out into all portions of the country, and taken the property of individuals without leaving with those from whom the stores were taken proper certificates or vouchers of indebtedness. Some of the best men in the whole country—some of the most loyal men—some who have made as many sacrifices for the benefit of the Government as any upon this floor, or in any section of the Union, or in the Army itself—have given up the last dollar, the last cow, the last horse, the last ear of corn, and last bundle of hay—the last thing they had—to subsidize the soldier and forward him in his just defense of the Government. One of these men has no evidence of the indebtedness of the Government, and after an application has been made to this quartermaster and that quartermaster, and this officer of the Army and that officer of the Army, nothing has been done by him, and he stands to-day with his helpless family around him without the slightest evidence that the Government intends to pay his debt; there is no law upon the subject, and he has no recourse whatever; therefore it is the duty of Congress at this time to say to that man, whose soul is as loyal as any man's soul, that it intends to act upon his case justly, fairly, and honestly, or at least give him some assurance that the debt will be ultimately paid.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman will allow me to interrupt him. I wish the House to understand that the Committee on the Judiciary have done all they can do to meet the cases made by the gentleman from Kentucky. Every case embraced within his statement is provided for by a more speedy remedy, in a bill which will be reported from the committee, than it can possibly be if the case is sent to the Court of Claims. I hope, therefore, that that branch of the case will no longer be urged as an objection to the passage of this bill.

Mr. SMITH. I understand there is another bill before the House, or to be presented hereafter, the features of which I approve; but the remarks I have made were more particularly called out by those made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] who said that he did not desire at this time to enter into legislation by which all these claims which come up from every section of the country shall be adjudicated at this time, thereby drawing from the Treasury money which is necessary to carry on the war. If the Government is not able to pay its debts and to move on under the great financial scheme which has been gotten up, and which now characterizes the Government, and which is admired by the whole world, we had better pause and reflect, and act in a way in which we can pay our debts as we go along.

But I have the fullest and completest confidence in the Government to discharge every debt, and my object was to present these cases so that Congress might legislate and the people know that they will be protected. Let the man who suffers feel that he is suffering for a country that feels for him. Let the humble man, as well as the one in the highest place, feel that the Government is true to its principles, that it remembers the man in the hovel as well as the man in the palace, and that it will pay for a spavined horse as soon as it will pay a salary of $25,000 a year to the President of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The Court of Claims, as organized by the law of last Congress, has undoubted jurisdiction of all cases of contract, express or implied. I infer there is a doubt whether it have or have not jurisdiction in cases of tort, from the language of the bill reported this morning by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. I am willing, with the chairman of that committee, to terminate that doubt by excluding, by the bill reported to the House, all jurisdiction in cases of tort. One word is due, however, to the impression which prevails that a portion of the existing jurisdiction of that court upon matters of contract would be excluded if the bill reported were adopted. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] was intended to leave the existing jurisdiction of the Court of Claims on matters of contract untouched by the bill we are now acting upon; and at the proper time he will doubtless move that amendment to the bill.

There appears to be another bill in the hands of a member of that committee, which they are to report and which is supposed to do away with the necessity of this amendment. My impression is there is some misapprehension upon that question. It seems to me the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio and the bill which the gentleman upon the Judiciary Committee means to report are both necessary to accomplish complete justice in matters of contract. The contents of the bill, which has not been reported yet, but which were stated by the gentleman who spoke immediately preceding the last one, seem to me to confer additional authority upon the commissary and quartermaster's departments to settle claims upon vouchers which heretofore have not been considered sufficient.

Mr. WILSON. I will state that the Quartermaster and Commissary General of Subsistence are not authorized to settle any claim upon an informal certificate. They are required to receive other proofs in addition to that furnished by the certificate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. That is exactly the mode in which I understood the gentleman who stated the case. It is to be referred to the quartermaster's or commissary department to settle claims which cannot now be settled by those departments because of the imperfection of the certificates, and of course the imperfection of the certificates is to be supplied before the department by evidence abundante. Now, suppose a party having an informal certificate, and with evidence which, perhaps, you and I would consider sufficient, but the accounting officer of the Treasury may not consider sufficient, should go before the commissary department and have his claim rejected. I am unwilling that the mere administrative action of the administrative officers of the Government shall be conclusive against that claim. If the bill which is now before us shall be passed without the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the rejection of a claim by the accounting officers of the Treasury will be final and conclusive.

What I wish a claimant against the Government to have is, first of all, the short, plain, administrative remedy of going before the accounting officers and presenting his claim, and then, in the event of its being rejected by the accounting officers, that he shall have a judicial remedy by going before the Court of Claims. The two provisions, therefore, are necessary to afford a complete remedy: first, the ordinary administrative remedy before the administrative departments, and then, when they have failed to satisfy the claimant that the rejection of his claim is a just one, the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is necessary to give him a judicial remedy against the Government. I take it, therefore, that both these provisions are necessary, and I shall vote for both.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think it is well settled that private property cannot be taken for public use without just compensation, and if that principle is worth anything, it is necessarily equally applicable to claims of every character against the Government, without reference to the nature of the circumstances from which they may have originated. Every claim of every character against the Government, arising from any transaction of the Government, be it small or large, is entitled to just consideration and immediate compensation. Now, as I understand the bill before the House, it proposes to make a discrimination in the claims against the Government. The law now provides that claims of this character shall be considered and adjudicated upon by the Court of Claims. It now has jurisdiction over all cases of this character, but this bill proposes to restrict the Court in the consideration and adjudication of claims growing out of damages done by the Army.

Sir, it appears to me that the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. Brown,] who proposes to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, is very proper. The bill involves very grave considerations. We should have time to deliberate upon it, and to investigate this whole subject, so that while we are prosecuting this war against the enemies at the South we may do no injustice to our friends in the North. I hope, therefore, that the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin will be adopted by the House.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I certainly appreciate the remark of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. Smith,] It is doubtless true that in this rebellion immense amounts of property belonging to citizens loyal to the Government have been sacrificed, and some day or other it is quite likely that a measure will be proposed and passed whereby such just claimants may receive compensation. But, sir, I agree with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Schenck,] that if we include the claims suggested for damages, and settle them during the pendency of this war, we shall indeed bankrupt our Treasury; and the suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio, that a commission might be well to perpetuate the testimony, meets with my hearty approval.

Now, sir, when this bill came before the Committee on the Judiciary we were informed that the bill which passed the Thirty-Seventh Congress had received different constructions; that by one construction the claims sought to be taken from under the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims by this bill were put within their jurisdiction by that law, while by the other construction, which the chairman of the committee stated was the construction which the committee of the last Congress gave, jurisdiction over these claims was not given to that court. Then, sir, the question had to be met. So far as the Committee on the Judiciary is concerned, they wish to have a law passed which can have only one construction. There come up questions of claims for damages by reason of occupancy and other such matters; and a bill, as has been stated, has been considered and passed upon, I think, by the Judiciary Committee, providing for the adjudication of those claims where property had been taken by quartermasters or commissaries, and where the appropriate receipt had not been given. In cases of that character the accounting officers would not entertain the claim, because the receipt evidencing the claim was not in the form prescribed by law. Under this difficulty the bill was considered giving to the Auditor of the Treasury the power, under certain contingencies, to settle and adjust the claims for subsistence and quartermaster's supplies where the receipts do not meet the requirements of the law.

The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio goes, in my judgment, no further than the bill which we already have under consideration before the committee, and but little further than the provision of the law already imposes on the Auditor of the Treasury. We hear a good deal of talk about property taken "sounding in contract," and about property taken "sounding in tort." Now, it is a question of a good deal of significance, a question on which, perhaps, good lawyers may have doubts, whether the Government can commit a tort in the prosecution of this war. It becomes necessary, in the course of the march of our armies, to occupy property. It becomes necessary, for the comfort of the soldiers, to use timber found on the ground which they occupy. Shall it be said that, in such cases, the Government commits a tort? If, in the progress of the war, property is taken for the use of the Army, is that a tort, or is it not an implied contract on which the Government is bound for the value of the property taken? I think, therefore, there is some danger in the amendment. It is true that it is qualified. It says that the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction only in cases where property has been taken sounding in contract, express or implied; where some kind of a voucher has been given. If that is not so, I ask the gentleman from Ohio to correct me. The amendment provides that the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction of those claims where property has been taken and a receipt given.

Mr. SCHENCK. Any receipt, certificate, or evidence of debt.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I may be mistaken, but in my judgment all the cases covered by the amendment of my friend from Ohio belong appropriately to the auditor's department, and will only be thrown out in consequence of non-compliance with the provisions of the law requiring a receipt to be given. That defect will be remedied by the bill already under consideration. I would not open the door of this Court of Claims to these cases. The Court of Claims, as it is constituted or may be constituted, has not the same means of ascertaining the truth and facts that the Departments of the Government have, which are accustomed to treating claims of this character every day. If you leave the jurisdiction of such cases to the Court of Claims, the door of fraud will be thrown open to improper affidavits and to false testimony to an extent that is impossible where the matter is left to the proper officers of the Government.

Now, I do say that this is a safe law, to take away from the Court of Claims a jurisdiction which it may assume to have to settle these claims for damages, which, if all allowed, would, in my judgment, utterly bankrupt the Treasury before the war is ended, even though it should be ended in the next spring campaign, as I hope it will be. It does seem to me that the ends of justice would be obtained by claimants, while the Treasury would be better guarded, by the passage of the law. No injustice would be done to claimants except that which is necessarily imposed by reason of the existence of the war itself. I hope that the bill will pass immediately.

Mr. YEAMAN. The question is, Mr. Chairman, not as to what ought to be done, but as to what is to be done by the bill now before us. I have never suggested, in the remarks that I have made or in the bill that I introduced several weeks ago, and that is now pending in the Judiciary Committee, that the Court of Claims shall have cognizance of cases of damages arising from tort. In that bill it is provided that they shall have cognizance of all claims arising in cases where property has been taken, used, injured, or destroyed by the officers or armed forces of the Government for the use of the Government. This bill says that the court shall not have jurisdiction where the property has been appropriated. How appro-riated? That is not said. The ordinary mode of appropriation is simply to go and take it and use it. And it is done rightfully, because there are emergencies where the troops cannot do without it, and yet where the ordinary voucher required by the Army regulations cannot be given. Now it is proposed to declare solemnly by this bill that the citizens may be robbed by the Government, and yet have no remedy.

I would hesitate before I would pass such a bill where you have given such a construction as that. I think that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] ought to pass, provided it is now before this House for decision. I think that the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Brown] ought to be adopted, and the whole question referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where all of these bills may be considered at once; whatever this House may wish to do, whatever the Committee on the Judiciary may wish to do, should be embodied in one bill, so that the modus operandi of prosecuting those claims shall be simplified and the jurisdiction of that court understood. We are not claiming to mulct the Government for damages caused by tort. We are only claiming that cases arising ex contractu may go before the Court of Claims. We claim that there is danger that this bill, without the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, would ignore them.

I say that there is no difference of opinion as to what we want to do; the difference is only in reference to the bill before the House. Give us time to have the bill printed, and to see what we are doing before we act on this matter. Do not let us act hastily on this bill, which may be considered to say to the thousands and thousands who have suffered in this way, "We have taken your property. You invited us to take it, if necessary, as a sacrifice in the cause of the Government, and now we will not pay you for it." If the Government cannot do it now, if there is danger of bankruptcy, let the Government now put the inquiry on foot, take evidence in reference to the damage sustained, until you can pay. But do not tell them that you will not pay them for property taken or given for the use of the Army.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, demanded the previous question.

Mr. LOVEJOY. This discussion shows evidently—

The SPEAKER. Discussion is not in order.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I ask unanimous consent to say a word.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I will withdraw the demand for the previous question, if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I will renew it.

Mr. Speaker, so far as I can see, this discussion evidently shows that the bill, as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, is the best bill that we can have on this subject. These learned gentlemen cannot agree as to what the amendment means, as to what tort is—and what is that other phrase? [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Sounding in contract.

Mr. LOVEJOY. So far as I can perceive at a glance, a man is equally entitled to pay for his horse, if taken, whether he gets a certificate for it or not. Now, I call for the previous question, and hope that the bill will prevail—that we will pass the bill as it was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. It is the best bill that we can have.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 74, noes 49.

Mr. WILSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and I wish to submit to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Brown] that if the House will reconsider the vote by which it referred the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I shall move to postpone its further consideration to a day certain; so that ample time shall be afforded for its consideration. To refer it to that committee is the funeral of the measure.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Will you have the bill printed?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. And try to have the other bill reported, so that we can pass on all the matters at once?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. All that we desire is an opportunity to move an amendment to the bill when it comes up. If the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary will allow us to move an amendment, he can make any disposition of the bill he chooses.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. With the consent of the gentleman from Iowa, I will move to postpone the further consideration of his motion to reconsider until to-morrow or any other day. If the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin prevails, the bill, by being referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, will be sent to "the tomb of the Capulets." I will move that its further consideration be postponed until any time that the gentleman may designate.

Mr. WILSON. Say Thursday next.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Very well.

Mr. WILSON. I agree, then, that by unanimous consent the consideration of the bill be postponed until Thursday of next week, at two o'clock p. m.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. And that furthermore the bill shall in the mean time be printed.

Mr. COFFROTH. I hope the bill will be printed. The people I represent are very much interested in this matter. I represent the district in which the greatest battle of this war was fought—the battle of Gettysburg. My district has suffered more from the armies of both sides than probably any district represented by any other member upon this floor. I desire very much to examine this bill, because it is of great interest to the people I have the honor to represent; and I want time to examine it, that I may come to a safe conclusion in voting on it. Therefore I hope the consideration of this bill will be postponed until such time as we can come to a safe conclusion.

The motion made by Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was then agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report, with amendments, a bill relating to the subject just now under discussion, and to ask that it may be printed. I ask that its consideration may be postponed to the same time as the other bill.

The bill (H. R. No. 63) supplemental to the laws relating to the War Department, and authorizing the settlement and payment of certain claims against the United States, was read by its title, ordered to be printed, and its consideration postponed until Thursday of next week, at two o'clock p. m.

INTERNAL REVENUE REPORT.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged question. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That six thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and accompanying tables, of which one thousand shall be for the use of the Internal Revenue Office, shall be printed.

I demand the previous question upon its passage.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote last taken, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

REVISION OF UNITED STATES STATUTES.

Mr. WILSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the bill (H. R. No. 67) for the revision and consolidation of the statutes of the United States, and to ask that it be printed and recommitted to the committee.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. BROWN, of Virginia. I rise to a privileged question. I present the papers in the contested-election case from the seventh congressional district in the State of Virginia, and ask that they be printed and referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. It is not usual to print such papers until the Committee of Elections request it.

Mr. DAWES. I object to the printing.

The papers were referred to the Committee of Elections.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to present a bill that was not quite finished when the Committee of Ways and Means was called. It is a bill to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes. I ask that it may be printed, and made a special order for two o'clock day after to-morrow.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Thursday next, at two o'clock p. m.

CONTESTED ELECTION IN DAKOTA.

Mr. DAWES presented some papers in the contested-election case in the Territory of Dakota; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

PENNSYLVANIA WAR EXPENSES.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PIKE in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 117) to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania for expenses in calling out the militia of said State during the recent invasion.

The bill was read.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Will it be now in order to move to amend that bill so as to include the State of New York, and to increase the appropriation accordingly?

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments are now in order.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move to insert "New York" after "Pennsylvania," and to strike out the amount of the appropriation, and leave it blank, so as to comprehend such sum as the State of New York may have expended for like purposes.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting "New Jersey" after "New York."

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, it is perhaps not precisely understood upon what this appropriation is based. By a law passed in July, 1861, there was special provision made for all cases where the militia were called out on occasions of this kind; and it was provided that when the State militia so called out should have had their claims audited and settled at the War Department, then an appropriation should be made, and the amount found due paid.

I should not have the least objection to entertain the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] as well as that of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] if the accounts of those States had been audited by the proper authorities, because then the law requires that we shall make an appropriation. We are passing no new law. I ask that the law which I send to the Clerk's desk be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be and he is hereby directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the Governor of any State, or to his duly authorized agents, the cost, charges, and expenses properly incurred by such State for enrolling, subsisting, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting its troops employed in aiding to suppress the present insurrection against the United States, to be settled upon proper vouchers to be filed and passed upon by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury."

Mr. STEVENS. I now ask the Clerk to read the papers from the War Department which I send up.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, January 4, 1864.

SIR: The Department has this day received returns of the amounts required for the payment of the militia called out for the defense of the State of Pennsylvania on the 25th of June, 1863, against the invasion by the rebel forces under command of General Lee. There being no appropriation out of which these payments could be made at the time they were required, patriotic citizens of Philadelphia advanced the money, and it is proper that they should be reimbursed without delay. I would respectfully recommend, therefore, that an immediate appropriation for that purpose be made.

A copy of a letter of the Second Auditor of the Treasury is herewith communicated, showing the amount of claims audited by him to be $671,476 43 up to date. It is supposed that $700,000 will cover the whole amount of these claims.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

EDWIN M. STANTON,

Secretary of War.

HON. THADDEUS STEVENS, Chairman, Committee of Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE, January 4, 1864.

SIR: Respecting the claim of the State of Pennsylvania, amounting to $671,476 43, for payments made to the militia called out under the proclamation of the Governor of that State dated June 26, 1863, I have the honor to state that the rolls and vouchers for said payments have been administratively examined in this office, and found in the main correct. Errors and discrepancies amounting to, say, $2,900 have been discovered, consisting principally of cases where the internal revenue tax is not deducted, or, when deducted, not accounted for.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. B. FRENCII,

Second Auditor.

HON. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Mr. STEVENS. It will be seen that the law under which we are allowed to ask for this reimbursement has been complied with. It is obvious also that the payment ought not to be delayed, on account of the manner in which the money to pay these expenses was raised by citizens who were patriotic enough to advance it.

There are several other States which have similar claims, but which have not yet presented them and had them audited, and among them are New York, which furnished some regiments on that occasion, and New Jersey some. In Ohio also there are some claims of this kind. As soon as they are audited, the law requires that they shall be paid, and all that is necessary is that we should make a specific appropriation. I trust, therefore, that gentlemen will see no reason for delaying action in this case. The claims seem to have been just; all the requirements of the law have been complied with; and I do not suppose anybody in the House will vote so as to defeat this appropriation, or to make it depend on an appropriation for New York or New Jersey, or for any other State. This is all the explanation I have to make.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am very sure that there is nothing in the law which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has referred us to, nor in the practice of Congress, that should deny New York an equal footing on this question with Pennsylvania or any other State of the Union. I think, sir, the alacrity with which New York came to the aid of Pennsylvania entitles us to the largest and most liberal consideration from Pennsylvania with reference to our rights in this regard. The city of New York alone has absolutely disbursed, through her corporate authorities, $5,000,000 toward the suppression of this rebellion, in the outfit of troops, in providing for bounties to volunteers, and for other similar objects, which, at a proper time, I intend to present as a matter of claim upon this Government to the consideration of Congress. But, sir, I cannot concede as a matter of justice and right or of law that New York is not entitled to have her just claims considered and acted on at this time, as is proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in behalf of his own State. I shall therefore insist on the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, Missouri is very much interested in questions of the character of the one now before the committee; and if the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] should be sustained, I should be derelict in my duty if I did not bring up the case of Missouri. But the view which I take of this question will compel me to vote against the amendment of the gentleman from New York; and I wish to give an explanation of the views I entertain on the subject, in order that I may be understood, not only here, but elsewhere.

My attention has been repeatedly called to claims from the State of Missouri similar in character to those of Pennsylvania, and on looking to see what had been the action of Congress heretofore I found the law which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has had read to us, and which I thought amply provided for the cases in Missouri. There is a resolution referred to on the margin of that law in another part of the act, which has not been read, which gives a construction to the act. There seems to have been some doubt whether it was intended to apply only to cases that had already arisen, or whether it would apply to cases to arise hereafter, and there was a resolution passed giving an interpretation to the law; and making it apply to all cases that should transpire in the future as well as to those already in existence.

With that view of the case, sir, I have not thought proper to bring forward any proposition in regard to the claim of Missouri, for before we can rightfully apply for any appropriation the mustering-in rolls, pay-rolls, and all other necessary documents, must be sent to the accounting officers of the Treasury. If we met with no stumbling-block there in having our claims allowed and audited, (as it seems Pennsylvania did not,) then we could come before Congress and ask for an appropriation. I am not disposed to press a case in which I am particularly interested in a way that would be outside of that law.

In fact that is as good a law as I want, because if there were no law it would be very hard for me to make up an opinion, in voting an amount of money here, how much I ought to vote to pay the claim of Pennsylvania. But after it has gone through the hands of the accounting officer, then there is a data by which we can do it in justice to ourselves and in justice to those who are making the claim.

Therefore, I go against the amendment, because I do not want to establish a precedent here that the State of New York is to come in and obtain advantages which other States neither obtain nor seek. And yet I would as cheerfully vote to indemnify the State of New York as I would to indemnify my own State, the State of Missouri; and whenever honorable gentlemen from that State will have the claims of their State audited under this law and presented to Congress, I will vote for their immediate payment. I therefore say that I will vote against the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] for I do not want to place myself in the position, seemingly, of giving to New York or New Jersey, or any other State, advantages not secured to my own. And yet I would go against my convictions as to the best mode of accomplishing my object in regard to Missouri if I offered such a proposition myself. I do not wish to place myself in the position of appearing to neglect interests which are of great importance to us. I have made these suggestions in justice to myself, lest the vote which I intend to give might be construed into a disposition not even to favor the payment of my own State. I shall vote against the amendment, because I could not make the law better, if I had the power of writing it, than it now is on the statute-book. I want no claim that is not just allowed to my State. All I want is, that after its claims are properly audited, they may be brought before the House, as the claims of Pennsylvania have been, and then I trust that the House will be ready to vote such an appropriation to us as shall be allowed at the proper department.

I have made these remarks in order that the vote which I intend to give may not be misunderstood.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentleman from Missouri has covered a great part of the ground which I had intended to occupy in regard to the proposition to amend this bill. My first impression was the same as that of the gentlemen from New York and New Jersey, that there was a species of preference conceded to Pennsylvania in making this appropriation separate and distinct from all other appropriations under like conditions. The State of Iowa, embraced in the western department, has incurred a large expenditure, at the same time with the State of Missouri, for which latter State we made an appropriation the other day. The commissioners appointed under the law of last Congress had excluded from their consideration all the claims from the State of Iowa, alleging simply that the State had assumed and paid a large portion of them. In view of the exceptional character of the claims of Missouri, I agreed not to move an amendment to that bill for the payment of a like class of expenditures incurred in Iowa, for I found that they are included in the terms of the general law, as are the claims of New York, New Jersey, and the other States. I am now in correspondence with the Governor of my State to ascertain whether the requisite vouchers have been presented to the Department.

But it seems particularly strange to me that the old and wealthy State of Pennsylvania, whose last financial report announces an excellent condition of the treasury, should be in such haste to draw on the Treasury of the United States while the poorer States of the Northwest, less acquainted with the means of obtaining an early dispatch of business in Washington, are left in the rear. I am bound, however, to admit that diligence deserves its reward. Pennsylvania has been diligent. Her claim has been properly passed upon. And if this law simply says "or so much thereof as may be necessary," I can see no objection, either on my part or on the part of the gentleman from New York or New Jersey, to allow the passage of this bill, because it meets the only case of all the States where the requirements of law have been complied with.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to ask my colleague one question, and that is whether, in his opinion, the act to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] referred, approved July 27, 1861, covers any other class of cases than those which arise out of States furnishing troops to the General Government for the defense of the Government and for the suppression of the rebellion? In other words, whether the militia organized by the State for its defense can create a claim against the General Government, which was intended to be covered and provided for by the act to which I have referred?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope that the gentleman from Iowa will send the act up to the Clerk's desk, that it may be read for the information of the House.

Mr. WILSON. I will read it myself. It was approved July 27, 1861, and is as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the Governor of any State, or to his duly authorized agents, the cost, charges, and expenses properly incurred by such State for enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting its troops employed in aiding to suppress the present insurrection against the United States, to be settled upon proper vouchers to be filed and passed upon by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury."

Now, sir, it will be remembered when that act was passed, the General Government, through the action of the States, was organizing the Army of the United States. The State authorities were enrolling, equipping, clothing, and transporting their troops to the places of rendezvous. This act must be construed in view of the circumstances which existed at the time; and it must be admitted, I think, that it was not intended to cover such cases as are presented under the pending bill in reference to the State of Pennsylvania. I suggest that there is no law whatever for the settlement of claims of this kind. The act of 1861 only refers to the enrollment, equipment, and transportation of troops furnished by the States to the General Government under the several calls of the President.

Mr. KASSON. It is a well-known rule in the construction of laws of this character, that the construction given to them by the Department which by law is specially charged with their execution, is, in certain cases, the authoritative construction of the meaning of the law itself. I have accepted the fact that the Department has passed upon this kind of cases as embraced under that law as one which gave us the guarantee that it was not only now but hereafter to be the rule of construction adopted by that Department. If the claim is just I see no cause of objection to adopting it as a rule. If, on the other hand, it was claimed that the law never intended to provide for such a class of cases, of course the pending bill should be rejected.

Now, sir, the case to which I referred as that of the State of Iowa was, that where the troops were called out by the commander of the western department, General Fremont I think, embracing the State of Iowa as well as the State of Missouri, the State of Iowa raised and sent under that call of the general commanding the Western department a large number of troops to aid in the administration of the Government in that department, and in the suppression of the insurrection. So also in reference to the bill the other day in the case of the State of Missouri.

Mr. WILSON. Is not there another act, or joint resolution, which was passed by Congress at the second session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress? And was not the action taken in relation to the Missouri claims founded upon the provisions of that act? I ask my colleague whether there was not such an act?

Mr. KASSON. There is no doubt of that. That was distinctly stated at the time. What I wish to say is that under the terms of that act these troops were employed by the executive officers subordinate to the President of the United States, and seem to come within the meaning of the law we have now under consideration, or rather which we are now construing.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment.

Mr. KASSON. With pleasure.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman and of the House to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, where it is shown how the claims of the States were adjusted and settled. It is on page 100, and is as follows:

"Under the act of July 27, 1861, to reimburse the States for expenses incurred by them in 'enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting' their troops 'employed in aiding to suppress the present insurrection against the United States,' claims have been presented by the States amounting in the aggregate to $30,458,451 79. A division has been organized for the investigation and settlement of these claims, under the rules approved by the Secretary, and considerable progress has been made therein. Partial settlements of some of the claims have been made as follows: Vermont, $613,766 58; Connecticut, $1,245,752 69; New Jersey, $356,667 49; Virginia, $38,319 24; Illinois, $3,351,517 50; Iowa, $29,279 92; Wisconsin, $55,440 99; Minnesota, $3,904 40; New Hampshire, $243,635 78; and Ohio, $1,307,045 38; amounting in the aggregate to $8,350,539 13. The claims of New York, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, New Hampshire, Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Michigan, Kansas, and Indiana, have been partially examined, and some of them are nearly ready to report to the Comptroller. Others have been temporarily laid aside, awaiting additional information or evidence from the State authorities."

Mr. KASSON. We have had no militia called out in the State of Iowa, nor has there been any draft there for troops; all the men that we have been called upon to send have volunteered. The gentleman's point, then, does not apply to my State.

Mr. BROOKS. The point I wish to make is this: if the case of Missouri is to go through, as it did the other day, we shall have bills for the similar cases of Pennsylvania, New York, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky; West Virginia, and Iowa. Why not pass a general bill in relation to them all? If we permit these bills to go through now without inquiry, the period will come by and by when those who have not provided for themselves will not be able to do so.

Mr. KASSON. I admit the force of the gentleman's remarks as applied to those States not provided for by existing law. I will say here that it does not look to me entirely right that the wealthy State of Pennsylvania, for calling out her own militia for her own defense, should take priority under this or any other law, unless she has earned it by greater diligence in collecting and perfecting her vouchers and presenting them for settlement. Unless she has done so, I think her claims should be provided for by a general bill. I submit the question, however, as to the application of the existing law to the case of Pennsylvania, to the gentleman who reported this bill, and who is amply competent to say whether the case is covered by that law or not.

My object in rising was to ask the House to agree upon some uniform rule. If we settle the construction of the law as contended for, then let the State of Pennsylvania come under it, and let every other State pass her claims through in like manner. But if there is doubt as to the correctness of that construction, then I say let all the States be provided for together, and no preference be given to any.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to oppose the views of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who reported this bill a day or two since, because they are in opposition to the experience our own State has had with the Departments in auditing the accounts made and presented in the early part of the rebellion. As early as eighteen months ago the State of Maine filed her vouchers in the Department, and it was only last week, as I was advised yesterday in a letter received from the Governor of our State, that a final adjustment was reached.

Among the items excluded from recognition in the Third Auditor's bureau were a number involving a considerable amount of money expended for the purpose of State defense. That indebtedness arose in this way: at the breaking out of the rebellion much fear was entertained of depredations by the privateers of the enemy then just put afloat. The authorities of the State raised a company of artillerymen to protect the national navy-yard at Kittery, and also the city of Portsmouth. This company was afterwards mustered into the service of the United States, but the claims for enlisting and organizing them, and for paying them up to the time of their being mustered into the United States service, were rejected by the Auditor of the Treasury Department, and they are there suspended. Thus our State has not received a dollar for the troops—not militia, but volunteers—raised for the general defense, and to protect the national navy-yard, although those claims were filed eighteen months ago. But here we find it is proposed to pay the State of Pennsylvania $700,000 for expenses incurred only six months ago. I have no doubt that that amount of money was expended by Pennsylvania; but as I desire that all the States shall stand upon the same basis, and shall share and share alike, I hope this piecemeal legislation will be rejected, and that we shall adopt some general and equitable system for all.

Mr. COX. I believe the pending amendment is that of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. I appeal, then, to the gentleman from New Jersey and the gentleman from New York to withdraw their amendments and allow me to offer an amendment which shall cover the case of all the States.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. In offering the amendment I did in reference to New York I did not desire to put in any exclusive claim for New York as against her sister States; and if the amendment which is proposed to be offered by the gentleman from Ohio shall be adopted by the committee, or be considered by the committee, I will cheerfully withdraw my amendment.

Mr. COX. I do not suppose that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] who reported this bill to the House had any idea of making it exclusive, or of cutting off any other State. He was entitled to the benefit of his vigilance. The State of Pennsylvania is happy in having a leader in this House who could report this bill. But other States, which are occasionally overrun by raids like that of John Morgan's, and whose militia happen to be called out for self-defense, have equal claims to consideration, and I trust no man here wants to give the claims of one State preference over those of another. They are all equally entitled to be paid for the services of their militia, and therefore I offer this amendment:

And that whenever the expenses in calling out the militia of other States, either to repel invasion or to suppress the rebellion, shall have been audited by the proper Department, the sums ascertained to be due be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, I see no objection to the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] but how any man who reads the law of 1861 can doubt that the intention of Congress was to reimburse such expenses as are here claimed by this bill I cannot conceive. Could anything be plainer than the language of the act of 1861? The expenses which are to be reimbursed are expenses incurred in calling out troops to aid in the suppression of the insurrection. Does any man on this floor doubt that the troops of Pennsylvania who were called out at the time the expenses provided for in this bill were incurred were called out for the suppression of the insurrection or that they did take a most important part in the suppression of the insurrection? Can any man doubt that such was the fact?

I take issue, therefore, with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] in his construction of the act of 1861. I say, sir, that the language of that act is too narrow for him to attempt to build such a criticism upon. I say that when the language of the act declares that expenses shall be paid which may be incurred in calling out troops to suppress the insurrection you cannot construe that to mean a direction that only those expenses shall be paid which are incurred in the raising of troops which are put under the authority of the national Government. I say that if the body which passed the law of 1861 had intended any such restrictive construction to be put upon that act they would have used appropriate language to define their meaning; they would not have used the general and broad expression which we find in that act. This being, according to my humble comprehension, perfectly clear, and no man upon this floor having the hardihood to say that these troops were not employed in the suppression of the insurrection, what is the reason why the law as it stands should not be enforced?

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. THAYER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. With the permission of the gentleman, I desire to add to my amendment the words "not exceeding $10,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. That modification will be made.

Mr. WILSON. I think that the construction I give to the act of 1861 is borne out by the subsequent action of Congress. By an act approved March 25, 1862, I find it provided—

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to allow and pay to the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates who have been heretofore actually employed in the military service of the United States, whether mustered into actual service or not, where their services were accepted and actually employed by the generals who have been in command of the department of the West, or the department of the Missouri, the pay and bounty as in cases of regular enlistment."

Now, sir, many of the men employed in the department of the West, and whose claims were embraced in the section I have just read, were raised by the State authorities of Missouri and Iowa. If those troops raised in that way, not for the purpose of going into the Army of the United States under the proclamation of the President, were embraced within the act of 1861, why was it necessary to provide by this act of 1862 for the claims of the men thus raised in Iowa and Missouri?

Mr. STEVENS. Will my colleague allow me to say a word just here?

Mr. THAYER. Certainly; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. STEVENS. The law which the gentleman from Iowa has just read was passed to allow bounty to those men raised in Missouri and Iowa. I believe that is expressed in the law. It says nothing about expenses. Is not that the language?

Mr. THAYER. That is the language of the act.

Mr. WILSON. The language of the law is, "pay and bounty."

Mr. STEVENS. Well, without that law those men could not have been allowed bounty. But there is no bounty embraced in this bill.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to correct him. The language of the act is much broader than is stated by him. It authorizes and requires the Secretary of War to allow and pay to the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, &c., "pay and bounty as in cases of regular enlistment." It not only includes bounty, but the pay of the men.

Mr. STEVENS. So I see, sir.

Mr. WILSON. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, part of the claims, I suppose, which the State of Pennsylvania had against the Government were for the pay of the troops, because the act of 1861, upon which they base this appropriation, directs the Secretary of the Treasury "to pay to the Governor of any State, or to his duly authorized agents, the cost, charges, and expenses properly incurred by such State for enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting its troops," &c. So that there is the same provision in the act of 1861 in regard to the payment of troops that we find in the act of 1862, with the difference that by the act of 1861 the amount is to be paid to the State—the State paying its own troops till they were mustered into the service of the United States—while by the act of 1862 payment is to be made directly to the men. And yet the Missouri appropriation was made on the report of the commissioners appointed for the purpose of carrying out that act.

Mr. STEVENS. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee cannot fail to see that the act of 1861 did not embrace bounties, but simply the expenses of transportation, enrolling, &c.

Mr. WILSON. Did it not embrace pay?

Mr. STEVENS. It did embrace pay; but the bounties which were afterwards allowed to the troops of Iowa and Missouri could not, under that act be allowed, and hence it became necessary, to give them more than that act authorized, to pass another act allowing them bounties. The act of 1862 recites that doubts have arisen as to the true intent and meaning of the act of 1861, and then resolves that it shall be construed to apply to expenses incurred as well after as before the date of the approval of the act.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendatory joint resolution to which the gentleman refers was passed at the instance of one of the western States, under the impression that the act of July 27, 1861, only applied to expenses incurred prior to its enactment. Now, as it is known that many States have had their claims adjudicated under that act, I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether any such appropriation as this, any special appropriation, has ever been made under it for the benefit of any State? Or does not the act of 1861 make the appropriation itself, and was not the joint resolution continuing it in force intended for the express purpose of avoiding the necessity of special appropriations for individual States as they might from time to time incur expenses? I undertake to say this, by way of application, that the State of Indiana, which has, within the limits and under the purview of the act of 1861, been entitled to large claims against the Government, has had those claims adjudicated without having any special appropriation made by Congress for that purpose. That was never deemed necessary. The very language of the act of 1861 made the appropriation. It directed the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the Governors of the several States those claims. Then came the act of 1862 continuing in force the act of 1861. If this view be correct, there is no necessity for the passage of a bill making special appropriations for any State; and the motion of the gentleman from Ohio is also unnecessary, because, where claims are adjusted, the claimants are entitled to payment.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Chairman, the act cited by the gentleman from Iowa lends no additional force to his argument. My colleague [Mr. STEVENS] is entirely correct in stating that the act of March 25, 1862, was passed for a totally different purpose, as is shown by the title of the act as well as by its text. It is entitled "An act to secure to the officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri, their pay, bounty, and pension." There was no provision for any of these subjects in the act of 1861. There was no provision in it to pay the men as men. Its object was entirely different. It was not to pay the men directly, but it was to indemnify the States for their expenses in raising forces—an object entirely different from that of the act on which the gentleman from Iowa relies.

The title of the act of 1861 is "An act to indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States." The object of the act of 25th March, 1862, was to authorize the United States to pay the men whether or not they had been mustered into the service of the United States, if they had been de facto in it. The two acts were for entirely different purposes; and they are so plain, both of them, that I do not see how the most ingenious intellect could for a moment raise any doubt or quibble in regard to their application. The act of 1861 is a general provision for the purpose of indemnifying the States that should have taken upon themselves to raise men for the defense of the United States; and it directs that when the expenses incurred by those States shall have passed through the ordeal of review which they have to pass through with the accounting officers, they shall then be paid.

We are now asked, in obedience to this law, simply to make an appropriation for the payment of the debt incurred by the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Chairman, I see no force in the objection raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.] It seems to be an unfair and ungenerous objection. Why, sir, should the State of Pennsylvania, who complied with the law in good faith, and took no unfair advantage, as I fear was perhaps very faintly suggested by another gentleman, from Iowa, [Mr. Kasson,] for having been so swift to apply for what she was entitled to under the act of 1861—I say why should Pennsylvania, who proceeded deliberately to audit her claims, who comes here for proper certificates from the proper accounting officers, and shows this House that these claims are just, that they have been adjusted according to law, and that they are all right, why should it be said that Pennsylvania should not, under the act of 1861, be indemnified for those expenses because the State of New York has not taken the trouble to comply with the law, or by reason of any negligence of that State or its agents in having proper bills made out for like action of the House?

Mr. WILSON. If the gentleman will permit me, I can answer his question by the provision of the act of July, 1861. The claims that the other States had against the Government were for troops raised under the President's various proclamations to furnish troops for the Army of the United States. Cases of that kind are covered by the general provision of the act of 1861, that the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Governors of the several States, or their duly authorized agents, the expenses, &c., of calling out and transporting troops, &c. If the case of Pennsylvania comes within the provision of the act of 1861, why is it necessary to make a special appropriation? Why does not Pennsylvania get paid as the other States have been paid under that law?

Mr. STEVENS. A specified sum was never demanded before. The gentleman does not seem to know that these troops were all mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. I am informed that the other States have had no difficulty. The gentleman from Indiana informs me that his State has received $2,000,000 for expenses incurred in raising troops at the call of the President. The reason why Pennsylvania asks for this appropriation is because these troops were not organized under a call of the President for supplying troops for the Army of the United States; it is because that State has acted in calling out her own militia.

Mr. STEVENS. They were mustered into the Army of the United States under General Meade.

Mr. WILSON. That will not avoid the point I am making. If these troops were raised and the expenses incurred under the call of the President to make up the Army of the United States, the general appropriation of the act of 1861 would cover this case. These troops were not so raised, and that renders it necessary for Pennsylvania to ask for a special appropriation. We may as well understand this matter. If the case is to be passed under the act of 1861 there is no appropriation necessary. If it does not come under the act of 1861 it is proper for the House to investigate it. The act of 1861 does not authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to audit claims for expenses for troops of this kind. Notwithstanding these statements of officers of the Treasury, it is found necessary to ask for a special appropriation, and that is the question we have before us to-day. It cannot be covered by the provisions of the act of 1861; otherwise this appropriation need not be made. We need therefore spend no further time on it.

Mr. THAYER. The Secretary of War may take the responsibility of construing the act in that way, and if he does, he can pay these claims without the action of the House. He can take that responsibility if he chooses. But his action would have been void in view of the constructions now put on this act. That any Department of the Government has put a construction upon this act other than that intended by this House does not settle the question in reference to the act of 1861. The argument of the gentleman from Iowa, therefore, has no force. It does not avail against the position I take.

I say no man can read the act of 1861, no man can read its title, no man can read the provisions embraced in one solitary section, and not, I think, be convinced that the act was intended to perform that function which its title declares it was intended to perform. It was an act of indemnity to the States; it was an act to indemnify the States for raising troops, provided they were intended and used in suppressing the rebellion. No narrower significance can be given to it; and the attempts which have been made to restrict it by reference to other acts seem to me so far from being successful that they favor the construction for which we contend. It is difficult and dangerous to attempt to construe a law which is so plain upon its face that he who runs may read—so plain that the simplest intellect may ascertain exactly what its provisions mean. I say no special pleading, however nice, can, in the comprehension of any man who will deliberately read this act of 1861, prevent his rising up with the conviction that it was intended for exactly what its title says it was intended to accomplish. I say Pennsylvania is here to-day, with this appropriation bill, standing not only upon the spirit of the law, but upon the very letter of the law; and why should she not be paid? It seems to me to be an extremely narrow, selfish, and unmagnanimous view of this question to take, that because the bill in favor of Pennsylvania happens to be the first presented to this House—or happens perhaps to be the second, if I class Missouri in this category—therefore that jealousy should arise upon the part of members representing other States. If Pennsylvania has gained any advantage in having her appropriation bill here to-day she has gained it not unfairly, but has gained it in pursuance of the very terms of a law this body enacted; and it is no answer to say that other States have not followed in the same direction pointed out by that law, and that other States are not here to-day with their certificates of accounts from the State accounting officers, and with their bills making appropriations.

I hope we shall act upon all these bills with a spirit of magnanimity and confidence in each other; I hope we shall not, in such a crisis of the affairs of this country, get into discussions based upon narrow, prejudiced, selfish, and sectional views; I hope we shall be able, and shall be perfectly willing—and I do not doubt we shall—to discharge our duties faithfully toward the whole country; that we shall not feel that we are here now so much the representatives of particular States as the fractional representatives of this consolidated, powerful, and victorious nation. I hope we shall enter upon the consideration of these appropriation bills for the several States in this spirit; I hope we shall avoid all sectional and selfish views, and all selfish motives in considering them. For my own part I am sure—and I can speak with perfect confidence on this subject, not only for myself, but for every other member from Pennsylvania—that when these other States come here with similar accounts, when they come here showing that they have complied with the law, when they come with the proper vouchers from the accounting officers of the State, we shall vote them appropriations for every dollar due to them, without stopping to quibble over nice points of law, without resorting to unfair criticisms in order to deprive them of any preference to which they have entitled themselves, and without regard to their action upon other claims.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I gather from this discussion, first, this fact, that this is an attempt to legislate and appropriate at the same time—that this is an appropriation bill presuming legislation which does not exist, and carrying the idea of legislation by mere implication. Now, sir, I suppose there can be no question of that fact; and whether this is a just claim or not, whether it ought to be paid at some future time or never, one thing is certain, that its payment now is without authority of law, and consequently is illegal, and therefore I take it that this committee and the House will not fall into the trap of voting an appropriation carrying legality simply by implication or presumption. I think if gentlemen investigate the matter more thoroughly they will be convinced that I state the fact just as it is.

The bill reads, "the same having been audited by the proper department." The person who prepared the bill dared not put in the words "having been audited in pursuance of law by the proper department." That simple amendment would be fatal to this bill, because it would make it necessary for the proper auditing officers to find some law justifying the appropriation, and the records of Congress do not afford any such legal justification, and I doubt whether any proper auditing officer, if he were required to audit the accounts in pursuance of law, would venture to give them his approbation. And therefore, sir, if there were no other objection, it seems to me that that is a fatal one, and that this claim must go by the board for the present, until the House shall determine whether they will justify the payment of the claims embraced in this appropriation. Until that time, I think that no appropriation should be made.

There are one or two other things I would like to say in connection with this matter. In the first place, while I do not profess to have investigated it very extensively, it seems to me that this is a case sui generis, and that it is not analogous to the cases of other States. These men never were properly mustered into the service of the United States.

A MEMBER. Yes, they were.

Mr. LOVEJOY. They were in some sense, I suppose, as the gentleman states it, but the bill is peculiar in this: no other appropriation bill of this kind, so far as I remember, uses the word "militia," but the term used has been "forces," or "soldiers," "called into the service of the United States through the agency of the State." States have been reimbursed for such agency, and very properly, but this bill is for the payment of militia called out for the simple and limited purpose of protecting the State of Pennsylvania; and I understand that when these men, under General Reynolds, got to the State border, they stopped, and would not budge an inch beyond the limits of the State.

Mr. STEVENS. That is not true.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I am glad to know it.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman is mistaken as to the facts. These Pennsylvania militia were called out under the proclamation of the President for six months, and went to the Potomac, and were engaged, raw militia as they were, with the regular Army of the United States, in several engagements.

Mr. LOVEJOY. That may all be, sir. It is not in this bill, however; there is no declaration or evidence of it.

Sir, I do not desire to say anything in regard to how the militia of Pennsylvania behaved, or anything of that kind. I do not propose to discuss that. I simply wish to state enough to make it clear to the House that this is a peculiar case, and that the main purpose of calling out these militia was evidently to protect Pennsylvania.

Now, I do not say that Pennsylvania ought not to be reimbursed for the expenses thus incurred; but it does seem to me, and I cannot help saying it, that a great State abounding in wealth, and that has certainly made a very large amount, directly or indirectly, by this war—and I love Pennsylvania, sir, with her coal mines and her iron and her vast resources—but it does seem to me that so wealthy a State, having, through her own agency, called out these soldiers to defend her own soil, and who, I have no doubt it is substantially true, performed no other service than the defense and protection of Pennsylvania, might have waited a little while for this $700,000. I do think that the grand old State of Pennsylvania should not at this time have demanded this money from the Government of the United States, borne down and oppressed as it is by the expenses of this immense and atrocious rebellion.

Mr. STEVENS. I think this debate has gone far enough, and I propose, after saying a few words myself, to move that the committee rise.

I do not understand the opposition to this bill. I cannot very well understand it. It is perhaps because there is glory enough for Pennsylvania in possessing Gettysburg within her limits; but, sir, I do not intend to refer to Pennsylvania in that respect. In defending Pennsylvania, the Union was defended. In defending Iowa, the Union is defended. It is narrow talk, it is narrow feeling, it is ungenerous argument, to talk about defending Pennsylvania alone because the army of the enemy happened to enter there to murder and rob her citizens and march on further eastward. Such things as that are hardly becoming men who are fit for this House.

But, sir, we have not hurried on this bill. It is brought in upon a communication directed to the Committee of Ways and Means—not sought for by them, but directed to the committee by the proper department of the Government, and asking us to make an appropriation to pay the accounts which had been audited by the Auditor of the Treasury. Is there any undue haste in that, sir? What has Pennsylvania done that she is to be assailed here, right and left and everywhere, as if the great object was to get up jealousies among the States and the members representing different States, that hereafter, when their cases shall come up, an acrimonious discussion may arise upon them? Sir, I had hoped that nothing of that kind would take place here. The law is as plain as human language can make it. Pennsylvania had called out, at the request of the President, a certain number of troops—about forty thousand. They were mustered into the service of the United States, put under the command of United States generals, and acted within their armies. It seems to me that, both by the original law and by the construction given to it in 1862, the matter is as plain as anything can be made. And yet the only objection made to the payment of these claims is that there may be a quibble raised on that law. Not a member here has ventured to say that every dollar of the amount appropriated in this bill is not due, that this money has not been all honestly spent in the defense of the country. No suspicion is cast upon the mode in which the accounts have been audited and brought forward. If there was no law at all authorizing their payment, and if the accounts had been passed upon by competent authority and sent here, should they not be paid? What kind of reason is there why an appropriation should not be made?

I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] to say that the city of New York has expended large amounts. So far as these expenditures have been properly for the defense of the country I shall be willing to vote their reimbursement to New York, which I know to be somewhat patriotic, as I will be willing to vote for the reimbursement of other States. Let them produce their claims and show that they are right, I do not care by what means and when, and I shall vote for them.

Another gentleman from New York has insinuated that if this bill be passed it may not be so easy to have other claims passed. I ask you, sir, are these insinuations worthy of the State? Are we to hold pledged as hostages the bills of one State—admitted to be right—because there are, perhaps, unworthy members here who when the honest claims of another State are presented may not vote for them? Sir, I will not do myself nor the House the injustice to suppose for a single moment that there is a man here mean enough and base enough to act upon such a motive; and I hope there are but few base enough to make the insinuation. If this House think that Pennsylvania is not entitled to be reimbursed what she has already paid, let us spend no more time over the subject. I move that the committee rise, for the purpose of moving to close debate.

Mr. COX. If it be in order, I move to amend that motion by adding that the bill be reported back to the House with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw it for the present.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say but a few words. I do not intend, for a moment, to impugn the patriotism of the great State of Pennsylvania. I do not intend to say that Pennsylvania has not presented a just claim to be reimbursed for her large expenditure of $700,000. But I do wish to say that our Treasury is now on the point of bankruptcy; that it is with the utmost difficulty that the constituted authorities of the nation can find money to pay bounties to volunteers so as to fill the ranks of our armies; and I therefore conceive that this claim of Pennsylvania belongs to a class of cases which should, for a time, remain in abeyance. It should be deferred until the ability of the nation be commensurate with its desire to do justice to all its members. If we now make an appropriation of $700,000 from our scant Treasury to pay this claim to Pennsylvania, my own noble State may next come forward and claim $800,000 due to her on the same principle precisely, and then may come forward Iowa and New York and New Jersey, and all the other States, if you please, exhausting the Treasury, and preventing the recuperation of our national resources to put down this rebellion. I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the considerations of patriotism call upon us to forego these claims, just though they may be, until the nation has greater ability to pay them than it now has.

Mr. L. MYERS obtained the floor.

Mr. SPALDING. I agreed to renew the motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is too late.

Mr. L. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I cannot permit to pass by in silence the slur cast upon the troops from my State by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY.] I could not sit still and listen to the assertion that they had refused to cross the State line to fight the enemies of the Union when I knew the facts were directly the reverse. My colleague, Judge KELLEY, who during the first invasion was in the ranks as a private, has already denied the assertion of the gentleman from Illinois; and he and my colleague on the other side of the House, [Mr. RANDALL,] who commanded the Philadelphia City Troop against the July invasion alluded to in the bill before the House, know that the Pennsylvania militia in those great emergencies not only crossed the State line, but marched to the Potomac, and were ready to march anywhere for the defense not of Pennsylvania only, but what was then an imperiled country.

Mr. Chairman, this is truly a case, as the gentleman from Illinois has expressed it, "sui generis." Last summer, when free soil shook with the tread of armed rebels who were striking at the very life of the Republic, General Reynolds, a Pennsylvanian, and one of the first martyrs of the subsequent bloody battle, commanded the troops in the advance of the army of the Potomac, not the militia, as that gentleman erroneously informs us. Upon his fall, another gallant Pennsylvanian, General Hancock, took his place. Then, too, General Crawford, another Pennsylvanian, led the famous Pennsylvania Reserves, shouting to them, as amid shot and shell they rushed up a steep hill and took an important battery, "Don't let the Bucktails!" (still another Pennsylvanian brigade) "beat you"—the army being commanded by that Pennsylvania hero, McClellan. Never before was there nobler emulation among troops; and while the brave soldiers of the Keystone, side by side with their noble associates from other States, stood there at Gettysburg a bulwark against treason and its armed cohorts, near by, fresh from the defense of Harrisburg and Carlisle, where the enemy's cavalry were baffled and rendered useless, fifty thousand Pennsylvania militia, ten thousand of them from my own city, aided by some regiments who generously responded from New York and New Jersey, stood ready with their lives to defend that Union without which Pennsylvania would be a keystone without an arch. Let no man disparage them. It was indeed a case "sui generis," and I thank the gentleman for the expression.

Nor do I believe that when our State presents her claim for expenses incurred against that invasion—especially as the General Government took sole control and command of those troops—the House will ignore or postpone it.

Yet what do we see here now? When this bill is reported to the House, a technical, and as I think unnecessary question is raised as to the mode in which a State should be paid the paltry amount—paltry compared with the service rendered—proposed by this bill to be paid. I say that when this sum is asked to be refunded, we find upon the one side technicality, and on the other direct opposition. I am surprised at this. I hope that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. STEELE] will withdraw their amendments. It has come to a strange pass in legislation when one State has to be dependent upon the action of the others; when it is declared that one State shall not have a bill passed in its favor, after complying with all of the provisions of the law, until other States are ready who happen to desire the passage of similar acts. If New Jersey or New York had presented their claims, had them duly audited, and were ready with a bill to pay their expenses incurred in calling out the troops which nobly came to the aid of Pennsylvania on that occasion, no one would more gladly support those measures than myself. My State will never forget the troops that came to her aid in that dark hour when not Pennsylvania alone, but the whole country was awaiting the event of the impending battle. She will not forget them, and I ask their Representatives not to forget her. When bills come up for them we shall not delay or oppose, but will support them most heartily.

It is technically objected whether the act of 1861 can be construed to enable the Secretary of the Treasury, without further legislation, to pay for these expenses. It is enough for me to know that the Department does not think that it has sufficient authority. It is enough for me to know, whether it has sufficient authority or not, that there has been no special appropriation for the purpose, and that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. STEVENS] desires one. It is enough for me that the bill is founded upon accounts and vouchers submitted by the State, and audited by the proper officers of the Treasury. To pass it will do no harm, for it is admitted that the expenses were incurred and ought to be paid. I appeal to gentlemen on all sides of the House to recognize the fact that the bill before us is to reimburse the State for outlays to her people—the feeble recompense of their great services to the Government in that trying hour, and the moral as well as personal aid her soldiers lent to the veterans of the Potomac at Gettysburg—a battle which not only made her soil classic, but insured the perpetuity of the Republic.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to make a single remark just here. It will be recollected that the only bill we have passed this session making appropriations for this species of service is the one which applied to the State of Missouri. That was a case in which the expenses had not been paid by the State, and had not been assumed by the State, but in which the payments were to go directly to the men who did the military service in the field. This bill now pending relates to another class of cases. It is for the purpose of disbursing to a State expenses which it had incurred and paid. The point, therefore, is, whether this House is ready now to adopt the principle of paying, at this time, the debts which loyal States have loyally incurred in aid of the great work of putting down this rebellion. It is not whether Pennsylvania is entitled to be paid at some time—as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. L. MYERS] who has so clearly stated her position can see—but whether it is now consistent with the other greater interests of the country that we should inaugurate the system of paying to Pennsylvania and other States the millions of indebtedness which they have incurred and paid.

I submit that none of us in this House doubt that Pennsylvania is loyal, that her soldiers are gallant and brave, and entitled to be paid. The question is rather one in which the financial policy of the country is involved.

Mr. STEVENS. Do I understand from this discussion that gentlemen contend that none of these expenses are to be paid until the war is over? If all the States are to be placed in that category, it is quite another thing. I supposed that all of them were to be paid; but if a different course is to be adopted, let it be done.

Mr. L. MYERS. I am glad to have been interrupted by my friend the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] because it has called to my mind a passage in the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] who preceded me, and what I have to say will be an answer to both those gentlemen.

I do not recognize the fact that the loyal portion of this country is in a state of bankruptcy, or pending bankruptcy, but rather in a state of the greatest national prosperity that ever a nation presented. Its people are prosperous, and this wicked rebellion alone mars their happiness. The debt of the country to its soldiers is paid, and paid promptly, and very soon I hope we shall give them a better compensation than we are now paying. We can afford to be generous, but we can at least afford to be just, and whether bankruptcy is pending or not, whether ruin is pending or not, I am in favor of paying every just claim when it is presented. I cannot recognize as proper or fit the remark which fell from the lips of another gentleman upon this floor—I do not remember from what State he hails—that we are to wait until this war is over before we pay the claims of the people who are periling their healths and lives in this holy struggle; and certainly the claim of a State which has advanced funds for such expenses is equally good. I believe we should settle our debts as we go along—paying those due our friends, and letting our Army and Navy settle with our enemies.

I hope, therefore, the amendments to this bill, coming as they do from States whose claims are as yet not vouched and audited, will be withdrawn, and that it will be passed as promptly as Pennsylvania has fulfilled her obligations of money and men and love for the Union.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I do not desire to detain the committee by prolonging this debate.

I have risen for the purpose of saying that I think the gentlemen from Pennsylvania who have advocated this bill are in error in attributing to us a desire that justice shall not be meted out to their State, by the fact that we desire that our claim shall be paid by the Government, and that it shall be audited in the same way that Pennsylvania desires her claim shall be. One gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] representing a Philadelphia district, pronounces the amendment which I had the honor to submit to the committee to be unjust and ungenerous. Sir, a reproach of that character should not come from Pennsylvania, certainly not from Philadelphia. If I were disposed to reply in the same spirit, I think I could retort not only upon Pennsylvania, but especially upon that part of the State which the gentleman has the honor to represent.

Sir, New York has set up no claim here for repelling the invasion of her borders, as Pennsylvania has done. Her claim is predicated upon an honest expenditure of money to aid in the suppression of this rebellion. She can protect herself without calling upon the Federal Government to contribute pecuniary assistance.

But, sir, New York has a just and equitable claim for protecting Pennsylvania—ay, sir, in advance of Pennsylvania herself; because we contributed more troops in repelling the invasion of Pennsylvania, on the last invasion of that State, than Pennsylvania did herself.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Certainly; I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman inform the House how many regiments were furnished for the defense of Pennsylvania by the State of New York on that occasion?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I say that within three days after the call was made upon the Executive of the State of New York fifteen regiments were on the way to Pennsylvania, and we contributed twenty-six regiments altogether to repel the invasion of that State on the last occasion.

Mr. THAYER. Then the gentleman will not answer my question?

Mr. COX. He has answered it.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I have answered the gentleman's question as I understood it.

Now, sir, I have no hostility to Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania is a noble Commonwealth, and she has contributed liberally and patriotically to suppress this rebellion; but why should she have an exclusive right to put her hand into the Treasury in this crisis and in the present condition of that Treasury, to the exclusion of other Commonwealths equally patriotic and equally liberal?

Shall it be said of us that we are unjust and ungenerous because we require that our expenditures shall be reimbursed? Is it hostility to Pennsylvania to ask that the moneys which New York contributed to protect her shall be paid back, when the expenditures of Pennsylvania are refunded to her? Sir, we should have time to consider this important question. If it be the law, as read here, that there is already a provision to reimburse States which have equitable and just rights, there must be some other object and motive in hurrying this appropriation bill through at this time. In my judgment, it is a nice question whether the law contemplates that the Government shall pay to States money expended for the protection of such States, or whether it is not simply meant to reimburse States which gave men and money to suppress the rebellion. There is a distinction between these two cases. As I understand this bill, it provides simply to reimburse Pennsylvania for moneys expended in repelling the last invasion of that State. If that be so, I, for one, desire time to consider that question. I therefore renew the motion that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PIKE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania for expenses in calling out the militia of said State during the recent invasion, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the bill to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means. I make that motion for this purpose: while I am as anxious—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. Is that bill before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not. It is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Therefore no motion in regard to it is in order.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled the following bills; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 15) to provide for the printing annually of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 16) to continue the bounties heretofore paid.

DAKOTA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, presented papers in the case of the contested election in Dakota Territory; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

And then, on motion of Mr. LONGYEAR, (at four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 13, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POMEROY. I present a memorial from an incorporation in the city of New York called the "Institute of Reward for Orphans of Patriots." The memorialists, members of this institution, an association incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, respectfully solicit an appropriation by Congress for the purposes of that institute, to be used in cooperation with the appropriations of those States that are making special arrangements for this class of youths. This memorial is signed by Dr. Valentine Mott, president, Dr. Horace Webster, Dr. S. D. Blanchard, and is also indorsed by prominent and distinguished men in New York, among whom I notice Henry Ward Beecher, Mayor Opdyke, William C. Bryant, and E. D. G. Prime, the editor of the New York Observer, and other leading citizens. I think this subject should commend itself strongly to the attention of Congress and the country. I hardly know to what committee it should be referred; but I move to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN presented the memorial of R. W. Meade, a commander in the United States Navy, praying for the passage of an act for the fair and impartial trial of officers to whom injustice has been done by the board under the act of July 16, 1862, with accompanying papers; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of James A. Farrell, commissary general of ordnance of the State of New York, praying for the refunding of certain moneys paid for duties on arms by the State of New York during the year 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS presented the memorial of Thomas Laurent, of Brooklyn, New York, praying for the payment of a balance due him on account of money seized by General Scott, in Mexico, in the year 1847; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. BUCKALEW presented the petition of Mrs. Jane McCrabb, widow of John W. McCrabb, late quartermaster in the United States

Army, praying for arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BROWN presented a memorial of citizens of St. Louis, Missouri, in relation to the payment of the claims of the Missouri home guards; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, it was:

Ordered, That the memorial and other papers in relation to the case of Alexander J. Atchoa, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 50) to authorize the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War, reported it without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass.

CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

Mr. WADE. I ask leave to introduce a resolution for the appointment of a committee on the conduct of the war, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider this resolution now. Is there any objection?

Mr. POWELL. I ask that the resolution be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That a joint committee of three members of the Senate and four members of the House of Representatives be appointed to inquire into the conduct and expenditures of the present war; and that they have power to send for persons and papers, and to sit during the sessions of either House of Congress, and to employ a stenographer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to its consideration? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. FOOT. I was not giving attention to the reading of the resolution, and I will inquire whether it be a joint resolution, which would require three readings and the signature of the President to be affixed to make it effectual, or whether it is a concurrent resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is simply a concurrent resolution, requiring only the concurrence of the House of Representatives, not the approval of the Executive.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 54) to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 55) in relation to the circuit court in and for the district of Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 56) prohibiting the sale of gold at a higher price than that paid in the regular market in the city of New York for United States bonds paying six per cent. interest in gold, except for exportation to pay debts; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Mr. President, believing that gambling in gold is the greatest evil this Congress has to correct, I move that the bill be printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 57) declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, therein named; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DEAF AND DUMB, AND BLIND REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the report of the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind be printed for the use of the institution.

EGRESS OF COLORED MEN.

Mr. ANTHONY also submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire if any impediments have been imposed upon the free egress of colored people not enrolled or liable to military duty, from the District of Columbia, and if so, by whose order and by what authority of law.

SLAVERY AND EMANCIPATION.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a select committee of seven be appointed by the Chair to take into consideration all propositions and papers concerning slavery and the treatment of freedmen; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S REPORT.

Mr. BUCKALEW submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the report of General George B. McClellan upon the operations of the army of the Potomac, recently communicated by the Secretary of War to the House of Representatives, be printed for the use of the Senate.

OATH OF OFFICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first resolution in order on the table is a resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.]

Mr. SUMNER. Anxious as I am to have that resolution acted upon, I shall not press it against the military bill that was under consideration yesterday. If we can proceed with it now until one o'clock, I should be very glad.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is one proposing an additional rule.

Mr. SUMNER. But as I understand the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] proposes to address the Senate at length on the subject, I presume that we could not reach a conclusion before one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over informally, if there be no objection.

PROPOSED EXPULSION OF MR. DAVIS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next resolution in order in the morning hour is one submitted by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] calling for correspondence between the authorities of the United States and the rebels in relation to the exchange of prisoners. It will be read.

Mr. SUMNER. I would suggest that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of the matter that was assigned specially for one o'clock to-day; as there seems to be no business in the morning hour. I think if we should proceed with it now it would speed it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the special order assigned for one o'clock this day.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. WILSON on the 8th instant:

Whereas the Hon. GARRETT DAVIS, a Senator from the State of Kentucky, did, on the 5th day of January, A. D. 1864, introduce into the Senate of the United States a series of resolutions, in which, among other things, it is declared that "the people North ought to revolt against their war leaders and take this great matter into their own hands," thereby meaning to incite the people of the United States to revolt against the President of the United States and those in authority who support him in the prosecution of the war to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution and the Union, and to take the prosecution of the war into their own hands: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said GARRETT DAVIS has, by the introduction of the resolutions aforesaid, been guilty of advising the people of the United States to treasonable, insurrectionary, and rebellious action against the Government of the United States; and of a gross violation of the privileges of the Senate; for which causes he is hereby expelled.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, on the 5th of January the Senator from Kentucky laid upon your table a series of eighteen resolutions, and the Senate, in compliance with his request, ordered them to be printed. These resolutions were placed upon our desks, and they have been read by Senators who have the courage to impose upon themselves a task so calculated to tax their powers of endurance. Having, sir, a reasonable degree of confidence in my own powers of endurance, I entered upon the task of reading these resolves aimed at the President of the United States, the members of his Cabinet, the majority in these Chambers, the laws of Congress, the proclamations and orders of the Commander-in-chief of our Army and Navy, and of all who are clothed with authority to administer the Government of the United States. I groped through this mass of vituperative accusations with mingled emotions of indignation and pity; indignation at these libelous denunciations of patriots struggling to carry their periled country through the fire and blood of civil war to peace, unity, and freedom, and pity that a Senator of the United States, in this hour of anxiety for our menaced country, could pause to indite and spread upon the archives of the Senate slanderous accusations against the patriotic statesmen and heroic defenders of the Republic. In this farrago of spleen and malice the Chief Magistrate, his associates and supporters, struggling to preserve the life of the nation, are accused, arraigned, condemned. The heroes of Gettysburg, Vicksburg, Port Hudson, Chattanooga, and fields made immortal by their endurance and valor—the heroes who rescued Kentucky, rescued even the hearthstones of that Senator from rebel desecration—are branded as "subsidized armies;" and the men who, at Port Hudson, Milliken's Bend, and Wagner, fought with heroic valor beneath the old flag for the periled nation, are stigmatized as "negro janizaries."

After hurling his accusations, sir, at the President and his supporters in the Cabinet and in the field, the Senator from Kentucky turns to the people of the loyal North, and calls upon them to revolt against their war leaders, take the power into their own hands, and go into a national convention to terminate the war. Should the loyal people of the United States act up to his declaration, should they be incited to revolt against the President and his constitutional advisers, and take the power in their own hands, assemble in national convention, a convention unknown to the Constitution and the laws, to terminate this war for the preservation of the Union, the fields of the loyal States will be reddened with the blood of civil war. The Senator from Kentucky declares that the people of the North ought to revolt against their war leaders, take the power in their own hands, rush into national convention, which would be but a mere revolutionary tribunal, proclaim peace, and adjust the affairs of the country. He asks the Senate of the United States, with their oaths of fidelity to the Constitution recorded, to proclaim to the American people this unconstitutional, revolutionary, and treasonable doctrine, that they ought to revolt and assume the powers they have delegated, under the Constitution of the United States, to the men who now fill the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the Government.

Sir, the Senator from Kentucky is presumed to know the meaning of the language he uses when he declares that the people ought to revolt against their war leaders and take the matter into their own hands.

Worcester defines "revolt" to be: "to renounce allegiance; to rebel; to desert; to forsake; a gross departure from duty of allegiance; a renunciation of allegiance; an endeavor to overthrow legitimate authority; an insurrection, a rebellion; desertion; sedition; defection."

In the sixteenth section he calls the bloody insurrection of the rebels a "revolt," thereby showing that he knew the meaning of this word "revolt" when he urged it as a duty upon the loyal people of the United States. The Senator must not trifle here; he must remember that this is the Senate of the United States, and not a barbecue in Kentucky. Senators cannot fail, here, to comprehend the import and meaning of the words and phrases embodied in these resolutions, and they know that these are the words and phrases of statesmen, and not the idle babblings of fools.

Sir, men are held to intend the natural and necessary consequences of their words and acts. When men organize, revolt, and levy war against the United States, and take the lives of unoffending citizens, they are, upon the facts, to be held guilty of treason and murder. Common sense requires no further evidence of a man's intent than the fact that, deliberately and with design and forethought, he does the act forbidden; to the injury of the citizen and the State. If a magazine be placed beneath this Capitol, and a train be laid connecting with it, and the same hand that placed the magazine and laid the train applies the torch by which it is ignited, and the structure is thereby riven into fragments from turret to foundation-stone, it will not do to insult the understanding of intelligent men by telling them that the contriver and doer of this did not intend to destroy the Capitol of his country. So, sir, whoever, in the Senate or out of the Senate, by apt and deliberate words, carefully written and published, advises any portion of the people to revolt against the executive department of the Government, he must be held by the judgment of mankind to have intended what he advises.

When, by the express words of his resolutions, the Senator from Kentucky declares that the "people North ought to revolt against their war leaders and take this great matter into their own hands," he must be held to have intended that they should rise in insurrection against their war leaders and abjure their allegiance to the Government of their country, for that is the precise import and meaning of this word "revolt" in the connection in which the Senator has used it. That the Senator from Kentucky means by the term "war leaders" the President and others subordinate to him in authority, and that the people should revolt against them, is not and cannot be open to doubt. After what has been set forth in other parts of the series of resolutions submitted by the Senator, lest the people of the North might doubt the statements so boldly and defiantly made, that they "ought to revolt against their war leaders," and that they might know why and especially against whom they ought to revolt, the Senator from Kentucky further avowed and declared that "the present executive Government of the United States has subverted for the time, in large portions of the loyal States, the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press and free suffrage, the constitutions and laws of the States and of the United States, the civil courts, and trial by jury." To make good these charges of the subversion of constitutions and laws, rights and liberties of the people, and to fire the popular heart of the North for the revolt proposed and advised to be a high duty, it is further declared in the resolutions "that the President of the United States and the civil and military officers thereof may commit treason against any State whose government is in the performance of its duties under the Federal Constitution, by levying war against it, or adhering to its enemies, giving them aid and comfort, as resisting with an armed force the execution of its laws, or adhering to such armed force, giving it aid and comfort."

That the crimes of the President may be made apparent, and that the virtues of revolt may be clearly shown to the people, the Senator, in the seventeenth resolution, solemnly proclaims that "he (the President) ignores the constitutions of Tennessee and Arkansas, and others that have not been altered in any particular, but are the same as they were before their revolt;" thus proclaiming that the constitutions of States are not subverted by revolt, but by executive usurpation. It is further asserted in this resolution that the President "affects the position that ten of the insurgent States have forfeited or dissolved their State governments, and requires that they be reconstructed on conditions prescribed by himself;"

* * * that "his project is to continue the war upon slavery by his further usurpations of power, and to get together and buy up a desperate faction of mendicants and adventurers in the rebel States, give them possession of the polls by interposing the bayonet, as in Maryland, Delaware, and portions of Missouri and Kentucky, and to keep off loyal pro-slavery voters, and thus to form bastard constitutions to abolitionize those States." That no man of the millions of the North thus invited by the Senator from Kentucky to revolt and take the powers of the Government into their own hands may be mistaken as to the "war leaders" against whom they are told they ought to rise in insurrection, in the eighteenth resolution it is further declared that "the people of the loyal States are resolved into two great parties, the Destructives and Conservatives. The first (the Destructives) consists of Abraham Lincoln, his office-holders, contractors, and other followers." * * * "Their real objects are to perpetuate their party power, and to hold possession of the Government, to continue the aggrandizement of their leaders, great and small, by almost countless offices and employments, by myriads of plundering contracts, and by putting up to sale the largest amount of spoils that were ever offered to market by any Government on earth. Their object is" * * * "to destroy or banish and strip of their property all the pro-slavery people, secessionists and anti-secessionists, loyal and disloyal, combatants and non-combatants," * * * "and to distribute the lands of the subjugated people, as was done by the Roman conquerors of their own countrymen;" * * * "also to enslave the white man by trampling under foot the laws and Constitutions of the United States and the States, by the power of his subsidized Army, and, lest it should falter, by hundreds of thousands of negro janizaries, organized for that purpose by the Secretary of War and the Adjutant General." Who can doubt, after reading these declarations and these denunciations of and charges against the "present executive Government of the United States," against "Abraham Lincoln" by name, and "his office-holders and followers," against "the Secretary of War" and the "Adjutant General," and finally against the "subsidized Army" and "negro janizaries," that these are the "war leaders" against whom the "people of the North," as declared by the Senator, "ought to revolt?" Sir, after such a declaration, and such an array of charges to make it good, are we to be told that the Senator from Kentucky did not mean what he said and took so much pains to enforce and justify? Are we to be told that he only meant to vote down peaceably at the polls this war, levied, as the Senator asserts, against States, this "Abraham Lincoln," "his office-holders and followers," this "subsidized Army," and these "negro janizaries," this "Secretary of War," and "Adjutant General?" A most lame and impotent conclusion, to revolt against executive treason and usurpation, against duly constituted authorities and duly organized armies, by a vote! If the Senator meant only this, how easily he might have said it. If he meant only this, why did he not say the people ought to vote down at the elections, duly to be held, the Executive, his office-holders and followers, his Secretary of War, Adjutant General, subsidized Army, and negro janizaries? No, sir; no man can lay his hand on his heart and say that this was all that was meant. Is that all that is meant by the sixteenth resolution, which declares that as "the Constitution and laws afford no means to exclude from the office of President a man appointed to it by military power," or who is declared to be chosen to it by reason of "the suppression of the freedom of elections," the "people of the United States would be incompetent to defend and unworthy to have received the rich heritage of freedom bequeathed to them by their fathers, if they permit that great office so to be filled?"

"Revolt," says the Senator, verily the people "ought to revolt," against the President, Abraham Lincoln, and his followers, because he has thus suppressed the freedom of elections in Delaware, Maryland, Missouri, and Kentucky; because his object is backed by a subsidized Army, and hundreds of thousands of negro janizaries, to perpetuate his party power. If the Senate should pass these resolutions, as the Senator from Kentucky proposes it shall do, can any man doubt that the Senators voting for their passage would, before God and the country, be guilty of inciting or attempting to incite the people to revolt against their duly chosen President, and the executive officers clothed with authority under him? Sir, suppose a resolution should be offered in the Senate reciting that "Abraham Lincoln" has levied war upon several loyal States and parts of States, and is now endeavoring, by a "subsidized Army," and "hundreds of thousands of negro janizaries" being organized and armed by the "Secretary of War" and the "Adjutant General," to appoint himself military dictator, and thereby "enslave white men by trampling under foot the Constitution and the laws of the United States," therefore be it resolved by the Senate that the people of the loyal States ought to revolt and rise in insurrection against the President, the Secretary of War, and the Adjutant General, hurl them from power, and "take this great matter into their own hands," wherein would it differ in substance or in fact from the resolutions proposed by the Senator from Kentucky? Who can point out the difference between this proposition and the doctrines embodied in the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky?

The Senate, Mr. President, ought not, in my judgment, to tolerate for a day or for an hour in this Chamber any man who dares thus to betray the high trust of the people. The Senate of the United States in this "dark and troubled night" of our history owes it to the country whose Constitution it has sworn to support to see that projects of conspiracy against the constituted authorities shall not be thrust upon it by its own members. It was long ago settled in the case of a Senator, by a large majority of the Senate, that one of its members might be expelled for treasonable acts, even though committed elsewhere than in the Senate. It is, therefore, too late to say that the Senate is not authorized to expel at once and forever from its councils a member who openly proposes revolt against the executive department of the Government, and denounces as a subsidized army the brave defenders of the Republic, of its homes and hearthstones, against armed treason. In other days these Chambers rang with menaces of disunion and civil war. The men who uttered these words of meditated treason told the people of the South what the Senator from Kentucky now tells the people of the North, that they ought to revolt against the Government and take the matter into their own hands. Under the lead of these rebel chiefs whose treasonable words once rang through these halls of legislation the people of the South did revolt against the authority of the Government, took the power into their own hands, and plunged the nation into the crimes and horrors of civil war. Who among us does not now regret that the Senate of the United States did not hurl headlong from this Chamber those rebel chiefs even as the rebel angels were hurled from the battlements of heaven? But these disloyal leaders, these champions of the slavemongers, whose hearts were swelling with treason, never made in the Senate a proposition so unconstitutional and revolutionary, treasonable and wicked, as is this proposition of the Senator from Kentucky. Never, sir; never. Unroll the records of the Senate and you can find no proposition of Davis, of Slidell, of Mason, of Toombs, of Benjamin, or their copeers in crime, so insurrectionary, revolutionary, and infamous as is this appeal, when the nation is staggering under the blows of armed treason, to the people to "revolt against their war leaders." How sublime a thing it would be, in this crisis of our country, for the Senate of the United States to rise to the heights of a stern and lofty duty and cast out one who has dared tell a loyal people to revolt against their Government and take its powers into their own hands. Such an act of avenging patriotism would fire the loyal heart of America, silence the mutterings of treason, and nerve the arms of the heroes who are battling and bleeding for the unity of the Republic.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I presume there are other gentlemen in the Senate who intend to advocate this resolution. I have been so informed: I so believe. That being the fact, sir, I should like to have the benefit of the full argument against me before I attempt to reply. I therefore hope that any gentleman who feels disposed to sustain, in debate, the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts will give me an opportunity to hear him before I am called upon to respond.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Massachusetts, who introduced the resolution, has been heard. It would be, certainly, very desirable, before the Senate comes to action upon this resolution, to hear the Senator from Kentucky; and further, in my opinion it would be advisable that this resolution should be referred, as a matter of course, to a committee before it is acted upon by the Senate. I had intended myself, if no other Senator did so, to move its reference after the Senator from Kentucky should have been heard. The subject is too important to be disposed of summarily without reference to a committee. Furthermore, sir, I desire that it should be referred so that the discussion may not be continued indefinitely upon the resolution, but that we may go on with the business of the Senate. The enrollment bill, which is before us at the present time, it seems to me, having been under consideration some two or three days, ought to be finished. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kentucky desires to be heard, I would prefer to hear him now; and when he has been heard I shall, if no other Senator does, ask that the subject be referred to the committee having charge of such matters.

Mr. DAVIS. I am ready on this occasion, and on all others, to submit myself to the pleasure and the judgment of the Senate. If it is more agreeable to the Senate, or to a portion of the Senate, that I should now say something in reply to the indictment and the speech in the opening of the prosecution by the Senator from Massachusetts, I am ready to proceed. It is not for me to suggest to the Senate what course it shall take in relation to this grave matter. It may not be very grave as it relates to the public and to the country or to the Senate, but it is certainly so in relation to myself, and I am willing to meet its gravity. I am perfectly willing now, sir, to make a reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, and then that the Senate shall act upon the subject according to its pleasure, whether by reference to a committee or by taking any other course which it may choose to take. I would, however, suggest to the Senate that if the debate takes this course, then, when other gentlemen shall have made arguments in support of the resolution, I shall have a full and a free opportunity to respond to their arguments as far as I may deem it proper.

I will then, Mr. President, proceed now in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, but preliminarily to that duty, I will ask of the Senate the courtesy that the Secretary be allowed to read the resolutions at length.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will be read if there be no objection. Does the Senator mean the resolutions submitted by him?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. The prosecution is a little enlarged this morning. On the previous day it seemed to be limited to a single resolution, but the Senator from Massachusetts seems to spread it now over the whole series, and he has entered somewhat upon a discussion of the principle of most of them. I therefore ask that all the resolutions submitted by me be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolutions will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolutions submitted by Mr. DAVIS on the 5th instant:

1. Resolved, That the Government of the United States was established by the people of States which had before been separate, sovereign, and independent; and they formed their common national Government by a written Constitution, and delegated to it so much of their sovereign political power as they adjudged to be necessary and proper to enable it to manage all their affairs with foreign nations and among the several States; and, both by its leading principle and an express provision, they reserved "to the States respectively, or to the people," all "powers not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the States."

2. Resolved, That our system consists of a limited national Government for the whole United States, of supreme authority as to all the powers with which the Constitution has invested it; and State governments for each State, formed by the people thereof, and holding the entire residuum of political sovereignty within their respective States, each government, within its sphere, being alike supreme. And as the Governors and all other civil and military officers of the States, as other individuals, may commit treason against the United States by "levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," so the President of the United States, and the civil and military officers thereof, may commit treason against any State whose government is in the performance of its duties under the Federal Constitution, by levying war against it, or in adhering to its enemies, giving them aid and comfort, as resisting with an armed force the execution of its laws, or adhering to such armed force, giving it aid and comfort.

3. Resolved, That in all the States and parts of States where the laws of the United States and the States can be executed, the military authorities should not be brought into conflict with the civil power, but should be strictly held to be, as they rightfully are, in subordination to it.

4. Resolved, That all elections to civil offices, Federal or State, should be in strict accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and of the States respectively, and be conducted by officers appointed by the proper authorities for that purpose; and where, from the pretense or apprehension of force, violence, or otherwise, any election cannot be so conducted, it ought not to be held at all; and every election at which any military force may interfere by imposing additional oaths or qualifications of the electors, or regulations for conducting the said election, or by changing or modifying the oaths and qualifications of the electors or regulations to govern it as provided by law, or to constrain, control, or direct the officers of such election in conducting it, should be held to be void and of no effect.

5. Resolved, That the experience of the world proves that there can be neither security nor liberty in any country without wise and just laws firmly sustained and uniformly executed. That is the life, the spirit, the soul of this nation; and all neglect and departure from law, and particularly from constitutional law, by agents appointed to administer it, although sometimes attended with seeming advantage, are sure to produce always, sooner or later, much greater and more enduring mischief. Wherefore a disregard of law by such agents is never tolerated by a wise and free people.

6. Resolved, That the powers of the Government of the United States are derived wholly from and limited by the Constitution, and by it are divided into legislative, executive, and judicial, and each class of those powers is vested in a separate department; that the President is the chief of the executive department, and has no legislative or judicial power whatever, and only such executive powers as are enumerated in the second and third sections of the second article of the Constitution, and such other powers as may be, from time to time, conferred upon him by Congress in virtue of this provision: "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

7. Resolved, That the President cannot be divested of any of the powers with which he is directly invested by the Constitution, nor controlled nor interfered with in their execution; but all powers conferred on him by law of Congress he holds in subordination to that department, which may supervise, modify, and correct his execution of them, or resume them, by repealing the laws intrusting their execution to him.

8. Resolved, That the power of the President to recognize the existence of a state of case amounting to "an invasion, or imminent danger of invasion, of the United States," or "an insurrection in any State against the government thereof," or "obstruction to the execution of the laws of the United States by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings," and to call forth the military power to meet such conditions, is conferred on him by the laws of Congress, and the repeal of those laws would withdraw from the President all that power.

9. Resolved, That Congress is invested with the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;" "to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water;" "to raise and support armies;" "to provide and maintain a navy;" "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions;" "to provide for arming, organizing, and disciplining the militia, and governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States;" "to guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and to protect each of them against invasion;" and thus the entire war power, and quasi war power, external and internal, of the Government is vested by the Constitution in Congress, and no part of it whatever in the President.

10. Resolved, That whenever there is an insurrection in the United States, Congress is vested with the power to suppress it, and with no other power whatever over the insurrection; and when it is suppressed, either by the arms of the United States, or by the submission of the insurgents to the Constitution, laws, and authorities thereof, thereupon the power of Congress is exhausted, and the insurgents are immediately remitted to all their rights, liberties, privileges, and duties of citizens, subject to such forfeiture thereof as may have been declared by law, after it shall have been adjudged by the civil courts in the mode prescribed by the Constitution; and Congress, much less the President, has no power to impose upon them any other terms or conditions.

11. Resolved, That the whole power and duty of the President in the existing insurrection is to grant pardons to those engaged in it, and, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, to direct their operations for its suppression; and, as such, his powers are strictly military, and are not different or greater than would be those of the senior general in the service, if the Constitution had designated him to be the Commander-in-Chief; the power to devise a policy or measures for its suppression is legislative, to which the President is incompetent, whether as the first executive officer of the Government or Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy.

12. Resolved, That the law of military necessity is not established, but only tolerated, in the United States. It does not, nor cannot, in peace or war, abrogate or suspend the Constitution, in whole or in part. It cannot authorize arbitrary arrests and imprisonment, or in any way interfere with the person of the citizen, but only with his property. It does not appertain to the President, or to the Commander-in-Chief, unless he be in the actual command of a military force, and then only under particular circumstances. It results from a present and urgent need of an army or military corps which is so pressing that it cannot await other modes, but must be supplied anywhere within its reach by its own power and action. It is not an expediency but a necessity of a military body, and creates a law and confers a power, for the occasion only, on its commander, of whatever grade he may be, to supply that necessity by taking property by summary military force, without depriving the owner of his right to be compensated for it by the United States. Each case of military necessity makes its own law, adapted to its own peculiar circumstances, and expiring with that particular necessity. There is not and cannot be any uniform, permanent, or even continuing law of military necessity. The idea that a law always accidental, evanescent, and in truth so inconsiderable, should have the magic force to enable Abraham Lincoln to bound over the Constitution and all its limitations and restrictions, and clutch the vast powers which he claims under it, is a gigantic absurdity.

13. Resolved, That at the beginning of the war, under the panic of the defeat of Bull Run, the party in power provoked to carry it on for the constitutional end to put down the rebellion and vindicate the laws and authority of the United States in the insurgent States, and when that was effected it was to cease. But more than a year ago, another and paramount and unconstitutional end, the total subversion of slavery, was inaugurated by them; and, at length, to carry on the war in this perverted and augmented form, the annual expenditure on the part of the United States has swollen to one hundred thousand lives, a much larger amount of personal disability, and a thousand millions of money, and yet the wisest cannot see the end of the war. Verily, the people North and the people South ought to revolt against their war leaders, and take this great matter into their own hands, and elect members to a national convention of all the States to terminate a war that is enriching hundreds of thousands of officers, plunderers, and spoil-men, in the loyal States, and threatens the masses of both sections with irretrievable bankruptcy and indefinite slaughter, and to restore their Union and common Government upon the great principles of liberty and compromise devised by Washington and his associates.

14. Resolved, That the present Executive Government of the United States has subverted, for the time, in large portions of the loyal States, the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and free suffrage, the constitutions and laws of the States and the United States, the civil courts and trial by jury. It has ordered, ad libitum, arbitrary arrests by military officers, not only without warrant, but without any charge or imputation of crime or offense, and has hurried the persons so arrested from home and vicinage to distant prisons, and kept them incarcerated there for an indefinite time, some of whom it discharged without trial and in utter ignorance of the cause of their arrest and imprisonment, and others it caused to be brought before courts created by itself, and to be tried and punished without law; in violation of the constitutional guarantee to the citizen of his right to keep and bear arms, and of his rights of property, it has forcibly deprived, as well the loyal as the disloyal, of both; it has usurped the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, and to proclaim martial law, and has established military tribunals in States and parts of States where there was no obstruction to the due administration of the laws of the United States and the States, by the civil courts and authorities; and ordered many citizens, who were not connected with the Army or Navy, to be dragged before its drum-head courts, and to be tried by them for new and strange offenses, declared by itself, and by an undefined and indefinite law, being but the arbitrary will of the court; ordained at pleasure a military despotism in the loyal States by means of courts-martial, provost marshals, and military forces, governed neither by law, principles, nor rules, from whose tyranny and oppressions no man can claim immunity; all of which must be repudiated and swept away by the sovereign people.

15. Resolved, That a free press, free speech, and free elections are the great and peaceful forces by which the maladministration of our Government, whether in the legislative or executive department, is prevented, reformed, or reversed, and its authors brought to public condemnation and punishment; and those bulwarks of constitutional government and popular liberty are formidable to malversators, usurpers, and tyrants only, and they must be upheld by the people at all hazards.

16. Resolved, That as the Constitution and laws afford no means to exclude from the office of President a man appointed to it by military power, or who is declared to be chosen to it by reason of the suppression of the freedom of election, or by the exclusion of legal voters from the polls, or by any other means, the people of the United States would be incompetent to defend and unworthy to have received the rich heritage of freedom bequeathed to them by their fathers, if they permit that great office so to be filled, or in any other mode than by their own free suffrages.

17. Resolved, That the scheme of the President to bring back the insurgent States is open to many and insuperable objections. The pardon and amnesty offered by him is upon the condition that those who accept it shall renounce their right to their slave property, and swear to support his unconstitutional proclamation and unconstitutional acts of Congress, which attempted to take it from them. He must have intended to put this condition in a form so obnoxious as to secure its rejection by most of those to whom it was offered. He affects the position that ten of the insurgent States have forfeited or dissolved their State governments, and requires that they be reconstructed on a condition prescribed by himself, and this against the true principle, which he and the legislative department of the Government had previously recognized—that all the acts of the insurgent States and people tending to their secession, separation, and independence were void; and when the inundation with which their insurrection covered over the authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States in them passed away, it would leave the constitutions, laws, property, and institutions of those States in every respect the same that they were previously, excepting only the changes that were produced by the mere shock of arms, the principle status ante bellum being applicable. He ignores the constitutions of Tennessee, Arkansas, and others that have not been altered in any particular, but are the same that they were before their revolt; and he requires those States to repudiate their constitutions that governed them many years peacefully in the Union, and to form new ones. He has no right to take cognizance in any way of the governments and constitutions of those States, or any other States: to the extent that such a power is vested in the Government of the United States, it is congressional, not presidential. He has no authority whatever to impose any conditions on the insurgents, and they are subject to none but what are prescribed by the Constitution and laws of the United States, to be determined by their courts. What right has the President to proclaim that one tenth of as many of the voters of those States as voted at the last presidential election may pull down and revolutionize their State governments, and erect new ones for the other nine tenths, which he will recognize and uphold with the armies and navies of the United States? His project is to continue the war upon slavery by his further usurpations of power, and to get together and buy up a desperate faction of mendicants and adventurers in the rebel States, give them possession of the polls by interposing the bayonet, as in Maryland, Delaware, and portions of Missouri and Kentucky, and to keep off loyal pro slavery voters; and thus to form bastard constitutions to abolitionize those States.

18. Resolved, That the impending destiny of our country can no longer be blinked. The people of the loyal States are resolved into two great parties, the destructives and the conservatives. The first consists of Abraham Lincoln, his office-holders, contractors, and other followers; the second of all men who are for ejecting Lincoln and his party from office and power. The professed objects of the first are to preserve the Union and to abolish slavery in all the States; they have about ceased to make a pretense of supporting the Constitution and the laws; their real objects are to perpetuate their party power, and to hold possession of the Government to continue the aggrandizement of their leaders, great and small, by almost countless offices and employments, by myriads of plundering contracts, and by putting up to sale the largest amount of spoils that were ever offered to market by any Government on earth. Their object is not to eradicate slavery, but only to abolish its form and the mastery. To subjugate wholly the rebel States, and utterly to revolutionize their political and social organization; to destroy or banish and strip of their property all the pro-slavery people, secessionists, anti-secessionists, loyal and disloyal, combatants and non-combatants, old men, women, and children, the decrepit and the non compos mentis, all whom they cannot abolitionize, and to distribute the lands of the subjugated people among their followers, as was done by the Roman conquerors of their own countrymen; to proclaim a mock freedom to the slaves, but by military power to take possession of the freedmen and work them for their own profit; to do all this, and also to enslave the white man by tramping under foot the Constitution and laws of the United States and the States, by the power of a subsidized army, and, lest it should fail, by hundreds of thousands of negro janizaries, organized for that purpose by the Secretary of War and the Adjutant General. The first and paramount object of the conservatives is to preserve their own liberties by saving the Union, the Constitution, and the laws from utter and final overthrow by the destructives, not themselves to be enslaved under pretext of giving a fictitious freedom to the negro; and to restore and perpetuate the Union, and to bring back the people in revolt by renewed and sufficient guarantees of all their constitutional rights. There is no choice left to any man but to be a destructive or conservative.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, it is always my object in life to be prepared to receive any assault that may be made upon me. I concede that I had not anticipated this movement against me, and did not expect it until it was sprung in the Senate a few days since. But, sir, I considered well these resolutions, and the various subjects that are embraced in them. They received my deliberate thought and my definite approval. As the language of those resolutions will convey their meaning to candid and inquiring minds, and as I understand them, their force and effect, I am ready to abide the judgment of the Senate or of any tribunal on earth or any higher tribunal, upon those propositions. The jaundiced, narrow mind of the Senator from Massachusetts is wholly incompetent to give a proper rendering of those resolutions. His heart and his reason both disqualify him from that task, and against his version I enter my protest, and I ask candid and enlightened Senators to interpret them for themselves.

Now, sir, at the threshold, I deny that I made any charge or any imputation in those resolutions, or either of them, that the army was subsidized; that the heroes of Gettysburg and the other battlefields upon which the American arms have been illustrated were maligned by me in the terms or sense that the Senator has imputed to me. What I said was this, and I repeat it: that if the present Executive and his particular friends and advisers entertain the schemes that I impute to them, as I firmly believe they do, and as I charge in those resolutions, the natural and necessary machinery to which they would resort to effectuate their schemes would be a subsidized army; and lest they should fail in their calculations of that agency to effectuate their nefarious and treasonable objects, they would throw themselves upon that army of black janizaries which the Secretary of War and the Adjutant General, against the laws of this land, are now mustering into the service of the United States. Sir, I do not withdraw that position. I stand up to it and intend to abide by it.

Now, Mr. President, I ask gentlemen to read this whole series of resolutions. I deny that there is a sentiment or an exhortation in them inviting to insurrection, rebellion, or war, or military violence; and for the purpose of sustaining this position I will read three of them that are a key to the whole series:

"5. Resolved, That the experience of the world proves that there can be neither security nor liberty in any country without wise and just laws firmly sustained and uniformly executed. That is the life, the spirit, the soul of this nation; and all neglect and departure from law, and particularly from constitutional law, by agents appointed to administer it, although sometimes attended with seeming advantage, are sure to produce always, sooner or later, much greater and more enduring mischief. Wherefore a disregard of law by such agents is never tolerated by a wise and free people."

"15. Resolved, That a free press, free speech, and free elections are the great and peaceful forces by which the maladministration of our Government, whether in the legislative or executive department, is prevented, reformed, or reversed, and its authors brought to public condemnation and punishment; and those bulwarks of constitutional government and popular liberty are formidable to malversators, usurpers, and tyrants only, and they must be upheld by the people at all hazards."

Now, I will read the resolution upon which the learned, profound, and patriotic Senator from Massachusetts drew his indictment originally:

"13. Resolved, That at the beginning of the war, under the panic of the defeat of Bull Run, the party in power possessed to carry it on for the constitutional end to put down the rebellion and vindicate the laws and authority of the United States in the insurgent States, and when that was effected it was to cease. But more than a year ago, another and paramount and unconstitutional end, the total subversion of slavery, was inaugurated by them; and, at length, to carry on the war in this perverted and augmented form, the annual expenditure on the part of the United States has swollen to one hundred thousand lives, a much larger amount of personal disability, and a thousand millions of money, and yet the wisest cannot see the end of the war. Verily, the people North and the people South ought to revolt against their war leaders, and take this great matter into their own hands, and elect members to a national convention of all the States, to terminate a war that is enriching hundreds of thousands of officers, plunderers, and spoilers in the loyal States, and threatens the masses of both sections with irretrievable bankruptcy and indefinite slaughter, and to restore their Union and common Government upon the great principles of liberty and compromise devised by Washington and his associates."

Sir, I utterly controvert the position that there is any insurrection invited or stimulated in these resolutions, or in any one of the series. The resolutions institute or attempt to institute a bold and a frank investigation of the principles and measures of this Administration; and I intend to continue that operation until the Senate expels me from it as one of its members. But, sir, if such shall be the judgment of the Senate, I have a higher mission than that of enacting Senator of the United States. I have the mission of an American freeman born under the Constitution, having imbued in my boyhood and cherished in my mature manhood its immortal principles of liberty, and to them I will adhere while there is breath in this feeble body; and I will go home, and among my native people, in my own loved Kentucky; I will raise the cry of oppression, and tyranny, of usurpation, and revolution against the faithless men who have charge of their own Government.

Mr. President, we have fallen on evil times indeed. We not only have a great war, a great insurrection, a great rebellion, which I have always said I believed to be second in wickedness and consequences if successful only to that rebellion to which the Senator from Massachusetts adverted, when Lucifer and his rebel angels were hurled from heaven; but in addition to that we have our own Government, the administrators of our Government, who are sworn to support it, sworn to uphold, protect, and defend the Constitution, not only to uphold the power with which the Constitution clothes them, but above the liberties which it guarantees and secures to the citizen, and without which the Government would never have been formed—we have these men recreant to their high trusts, by the grossest perversion of power, by its glaring abuse and usurpation, both civil and military, trying to subvert that Constitution and the popular liberties which it secures. And if any man has the audacity to question their measures, their justice, their wisdom, their constitutionality, their compatibility with the continuance of popular liberty, the man who dares to attempt to perform that task is branded and denounced by them as disloyal, as a traitor. Sir, a grosser perversion of language, a bolder slander than what has been uttered by the Senator from Massachusetts against me never fell from human lips.

Mr. President, we have had great men in the past. The founders of our Government were great men; wise, good, great patriots. When I desire to learn the principles of our Government and of our Constitution, I go to that noble fountain of political truth, their illustrations of it. Such men as the Senator from Massachusetts only perform the ignoble and base office of attempting to muddle that fountain. He is not competent to any other work. Sir, I will read from what Mr. Webster said upon this subject of investigating the measures of Government and its officers:

"It is the ancient and indubitable prerogative of the people to canvass public measures and the merits of public men. It is not to be drawn into controversy. It is as undoubted as the right of breathing the air or walking upon the earth. Belonging to private life as a right, it belongs to public life as a duty, and it is the last duty that I shall abandon. This high constitutional privilege I shall defend and exercise at all hazards."

In that sentiment I am but the humble follower of the immortal expounder of the Constitution. At a far-off and humble distance, I intend to follow his lead, his enunciation of that great sentiment, and though I may not be as much in advance and efficiency as others in upholding it, I will be found as steady and true to its support as any one.

The Senator from Massachusetts seems to have installed himself into the position of a sort of overseer of this body. He certainly has been playing, or attempting to play, that part ever since I have been a member of it, and I have been amused at the important, authoritative, and dictatorial manner with which he bustles about in this Senate, and administers his lectures and rebukes to everybody, to use the fashionable term, whether they are on his side or the other side of the Chamber. He is very frequent in, and exceedingly pleased with, his use of the term "Government." He has persuaded himself that the President, the Secretary of War, and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate constitute the Government. He is perfectly assured, beyond all doubt, that he is the Senate, or if not the entire Senate, at any rate much the largest and most important part of it. Although the Senator so assumes and so arrogates to himself, I do not think there is a human being, in the Senate or out of the Senate, that is imposed upon by that delusion save and except himself. I will read the resolution which this learned Senator, this able man in all affairs of peace or war, who instinctively, intuitively conceives and comprehends everything, whether in legislation, or jurisprudence, or administration, or war in the field—I will read the resolution which that Senator threw before the Senate when this subject was brought into it:

"Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of submitting a resolution of a personal nature. I find on my desk a series of resolutions introduced into the Senate on the 5th instant by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS.] Those resolutions class the Government and its supporters—"

The Vice President, then occupying the chair, interrupted him, and said:

"The Senator will first submit his resolution."

I should have supposed that a man of his experience and his nice and high sense of senatorial propriety would have come to that conclusion without being admonished to it by the Presiding Officer.

"Mr. WILSON. Very well; I submit my resolution."

"THE VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate, as follows:

"The Secretary read the resolution, as follows: 'Whereas the Hon. GARRETT DAVIS, a Senator from the State of Kentucky, did on the 5th day of January, A. D. 1864, introduce into the Senate of the United States a series of resolutions in which, among other things, it is declared that 'the people North ought to revolt against their war leaders and take this great matter into their own hands,' thereby meaning to incite the people of the United States to revolt against the President of the United States and those in authority who support him in the prosecution of the war to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution and the Union, and to take the prosecution of the war into their own hands: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the said GARRETT DAVIS has, by the introduction of the resolutions aforesaid, been guilty of advising the people of the United States to treasonable, insurrectionary, and rebellious action against the Government of the United States, and of a gross violation of the privileges of the Senate; for which causes he is hereby expelled."

Oh, if the Senator had only been as puissant as he fancies himself to be, if he had had a power commensurate to his purpose, the deed then would have been done; but I thank my stars that there are juster, wiser, better men, abler men, and more patriotic by immeasurable odds, in this Senate and in the whole country than the Senator from Massachusetts. If there were not, God save the country, or it would go speedily to irretrievable and hopeless ruin.

"THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Will the Senate give unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution at the present time?"

"Mr. WILSON. I do not propose to call it up for action at the present time, but I intend to do so at some time hereafter, for I desire to record my vote upon it. I have offered this resolution without consultation with any Senator, on my own responsibility."

Heavens! what a responsibility it is.

"Often I heard the men who organized this treasonable rebellion threaten the dissolution of the Union, and make treasonable appeals to the country, and when this bloody revolution opened I resolved that if I ever heard in this Chamber more treasonable utterances, I would move the expulsion of the Senator uttering words of treason."

What patriotism! What a noble and courageous patriot! How long did that Senator sit under those enunciations of treason three years ago? I was then at home busily employed in my domestic affairs and in the prosecution of my profession. Occasionally I adverted to and read to some extent the debates in the Senate. I read the criminal avowals of the traitors who have organized this great crime, this great rebellion. I read the declaration of a man with whom I once messed as an associate, when I was formerly a member of the other House—Mr. Toombs—who stood up in front of that chair, in which sat the Presiding Officer of this Senate, and boldly announced to him and to all the Senators present, "I am a rebel, and you never looked upon a better rebel." How was it with Mason of Virginia, another audacious traitor? He stood in the same presence, and declared, "I owe no allegiance to the Government of the United States." How spoke Wigfall and Davis and the other leaders in this great rebellion? Why, sir, day in and day out, and nearly every hour of the day that the Senate was in session, they flouted their treasonable asseverations, their denunciations of the Government and of its power, in the presence of the pure and august and courageous and patriotic Senator from Massachusetts, and he was as dumb as a fish. Was there ever such a grand theater for the display of his moral and physical courage, and the highest order of patriotism if he had had it? I did not read in my distant home the declarations of those audacious traitors without feeling my blood boil within my veins. Had I been present and a member of the Senate, and had heard their utterances of bold treason, and witnessed the insulting manner with which they assailed their own Government and country, I believe I would have been a little more demonstrative than the mute Senator from Massachusetts was.

The Senator was then in a minority; but he was in the presence of avowed traitors; he had no army to back him in any line of conduct he chose to adopt; but now the state of things is altered. I am here in a minority; the Senator from Massachusetts is in a triumphant and overwhelming majority in this body; and in addition to that, he is supported by hundreds of thousands of soldiers, whose officers hold their places by the will of the power at the other end of the avenue, and when they are ordered to do the behests of their chiefs they must do it, or dismissal, disgrace, a court-martial, martial law, and sentences to be shot will be their doom. But, Mr. President, if the condition of things could be changed, if it were possible for some Prospero to lure back the party that was then in power, and to place the Senator in its midst, and he was doomed to suffer the shame, the humiliation, the ignominy to his patriotic soul, of again listening to the treasonable declarations of those men, would we ever hear of a resolution from him to expel them, or any of them? I think not. Men are very brave and very valorous when the danger has passed away; but when his party command the situation, and have congressional majorities, and armies numbered by hundreds of thousands to do their bidding, oh, how wondrously brave is the Senator from Massachusetts!

But I will read further of the Senator's remarks: "These are not words uttered in debate, but they are in the Senator's resolutions."

The Senator was so important, so all-sufficient and self-sufficient and insufficient that he would not deign to consult with a single individual on this subject. He gets up and puts on foot the proceeding upon his individual responsibility. "Oh, this glory shall be mine; none shall share it with me," I suppose he said to himself. I reckon the Senator, by all the acts of his life before, military and civil, had won so little of true glory that he would be very thankful for small favors, and would be glad to reap the notoriety of my expulsion upon his resolution without any cause for which any Senator ought to be even challenged, except in the course of manly and free debate.

"He tells the people, he asks the Senate to tell the people of the country, the loyal men of the North, and the rebels of the South, to revolt; yes, sir, to revolt against their war leaders, to take affairs into their own hands, to elect delegates to a national convention, to stop the war."

The learned, the profound Senator from Massachusetts declares that a national convention is treason, that it is a thing unknown to the Constitution and altogether unauthorized by it. I am told that that Senator boasts of being the successor of Mr. Webster. Ye gods, what a succession! [Laughter.] "To stop the war." There is the point. There is where it pinches. The bloody-minded Senator from Massachusetts does not want the war to stop. Well, sir, I do not desire it, and as far as my vote goes it shall not stop until the rebels have submitted to the Constitution and laws and authority of the United States. That is my position and the position of my State. I have held it in scenes where the soul of the Senator from Massachusetts, brave as he wishes to be thought to be, would have quailed. I intend to hold it forever; but I intend to hold it upon the Constitution according to my understanding, upon its restrictions and limitations of power, upon its distribution among the various departments—the legislative to one, the executive to another without a particle of legislative, and the judicial power to a third. Because men violate these principles and these fundamental divisions of the great powers of the Government, I am not going to be recreant to the Government and the country. I will sustain those who are intrusted to administer it, however incompetent and unworthy they may be. Although I believe, I religiously believe, and would go to the stake to-day in proof, that they are flagrantly and wickedly violating the Constitution, yet that would not induce me to pause one moment in voting to them proper supplies and means to carry on the war to a successful issue; far from it. But here is where the shoe pinches the Senator. His great and paramount purpose is to carry on this war to the final destruction of slavery; to use all the war powers and all the other powers that the executive department can usurp, or induce the people to acquiesce in their exercising, to the annihilation of slavery per fas aut nefas.

I propound to the Senator from Massachusetts this question: if the rebels in the southern States were to offer to come back to-morrow upon condition that they should have all their rights under the Constitution except so far as those rights have been forfeited by their conduct and crimes under that instrument, and as that forfeiture might be adjudged by the appropriate tribunals, would you agree, sir, that they should come back and hold slavery in all those States as heretofore? The Senator is silent. His heart answers that question. There is no man in the Senate who has observed his course but what knows that he is more devoted to the abolition of slavery everywhere than he is to the vindication of the Constitution, laws, and authority of the United States; and I venture now the proposition that if the choice was offered him to-day, or to-night upon his pillow, which will you take, sir, the separation of the southern States or the restoration of all the States upon the basis to which I have just adverted, he would not hesitate one instant of time in taking separation of the southern States. But he is now in a party that has the majority, and so he asserts the popular, the patriotic, the revered doctrine that it is the duty of every true man to preserve the Union, but always upon the sine qua non that slavery must be abolished everywhere, even if the Constitution protect it. His true position is that, as his party have the control of the Government and the direction of the most numerous and efficient Army ever assembled upon the earth, and they will soon have this rebellion at their feet, it and slavery must expire together; and however soon the first might be effected, it shall never be except simultaneously with the last, whatever may be the cost even to the loyal in slaughter, misery, and rapine. Sir, I say that that being the Senator's purpose his position is nefarious, it is violative of his oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and it is immeasurably wicked. To hear him talk about his loyalty, a stranger coming into this Chamber would suppose that there was no other man in the United States who had any loyalty but himself, or at any rate beyond all sort of measure and comparison he was the most loyal, Constitution-loving, and Constitution-supporting man in America. I will examine that proposition for a moment by and by.

But he says the national convention which I ask the people of the United States to call is unconstitutional. I admit that if a convention was called in any mode different from what is prescribed in the Constitution itself it would be revolutionary; but at the same time I assume this position, and I am ready to maintain it, that if a majority of the people of all the States chose any day to meet together in sovereign convention and to do away with their Government they have the right and the power to do it.

Mr. HOWARD. Would that be constitutional?

Mr. DAVIS. No; I said it would be revolutionary; but they have the power and the right to do it. I am opposed to all such irregular exercises of power, thus to call a convention, and it would be unnecessary, as the people could then require it to be called in the ordinary mode. I am a friend of law and of order, of liberty, of regulated liberty; and without law, constitutional and statutory, inflexibly executed, there never can be liberty or security.

Now, sir, I am stating a proposition, not that I assume that it ought to be acted upon. I am opposed to it as a practical proposition; but our Government is a political partnership. A mercantile partnership is formed; it has half a dozen partners.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I wish to understand the Senator from Kentucky as clearly as possible, and if I misunderstand him I desire him to correct me. I understand him to affirm this proposition: that if a majority of the people of all the States of the Union should see fit to assemble in national convention, a convention thus containing a majority of all the people of each of the several States would have not only the power but the right to abolish the present Government and to establish such other Government as they might see fit. I understand the Senator to aver this to be the right of a majority of the people. If that is his idea I shall be very much obliged to him to explain from what source he derives this alleged right on the part of the majority of the people of the several States. Is it derived from the Constitution? If it is I admit that it is a right; but if it is not derived from that source, I wish him to explain whence he derives it.

Mr. DAVIS. I was just proceeding, Mr. President, in an explanation of that position. I hope the honorable Senator will preserve his patience and will allow me to get along with my own explanation.

Mr. HOWARD. There is no want of patience, sir, on my part.

Mr. DAVIS. And when I have made my explanation fully, if it is not satisfactory to the honorable gentleman, or if there is anything upon which he desires the light of my further declarations of opinion, I will most cheerfully grant it to him.

I was proceeding to illustrate that principle, Mr. President. I have stated distinctly here that I am opposed to all revolutions in the Government, either military or pacific, whether they are brought about by armies in the field, or by conventions, or by the conspiracy and usurpations of those who have the possession of the Government. I am opposed to any convention being called as a matter of policy, and of the highest and most permanent policy, unless it be called in strict conformity to the Constitution. But at the same time

I maintain, as an abstract principle, that the people of the United States, if a majority of all the States concur, have the right and the power both—a revolutionary right I admit—to meet together and to do away with their present Government if they see fit, and I was about to illustrate it by a mercantile partnership.

This Government and this social organization of ours is nothing but a political partnership. Six gentlemen get together and they form a partnership in trade. They enter into articles of partnership that is to continue for a certain number of years, and it is not to be changed without the concurrence of the partners. Suppose that immediately after this partnership has been commenced all the partners get together and they then and there agree that they will cancel their contract of partnership and do away with it, have they not the power to make the cancellation? So of the people of the States in dissolving their Government. But that is an abstract proposition; it is abstract to my purpose; it is opposed to my notions of proper and safe policy.

But, sir, the convention that I suggest in the resolutions is not of that character. I speak of "convention" as the term is used in the Constitution. I ask the people of all the States to get together and to go into national convention to take this great and desolating and cruel war into their own hands, to roll back its bloody billows as they sweep over the whole country, destroying it, and to reconstruct their Union upon the great principles of compromise and of liberty upon which Washington and his associates formed it. I suppose to that position there can be no just exception.

But, Mr. President, I will go on. When the Senator from Massachusetts took his seat he did not intend to call up the measure then, he intended to place me under arrest, to put me in a sort of state of suspension like Mohammed's coffin, I suppose, in the Senate, and when it suited his good pleasure he would call up the matter for the consideration and decision of the Senate. In the mean time, I suppose, I was to be in a sort of "durance vile." I presume that no gentleman will deny the position that any durance that the Senator from Massachusetts could establish over any person whatever would be vile enough.

"Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts presents a garbled version of my resolution."

It did; a flagrantly garbled version of my resolution.

"It does not intend, nor is it so worded as to embrace the sense and inferences that the Senator draws from it; and they are not authorized by either its spirit or language."

Here is the avowal, the interpretation of my resolution which I made at the moment when it was assailed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

"Sir, what did that honorable Senator admit within the last two years? He admitted that when his own State was in a state of rebellion against the United States he sympathized with that rebellion."

"Mr. WILSON. No, sir."

"Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senator did."

"Mr. WILSON. No, sir."

"Mr. DAVIS. I interrogated that Senator and his colleague in relation to their course and sympathies in the Burns case that occurred in Boston some years ago. 'The galled jade winces'; 'my withers are unwrung.' When the gentleman speaks of treason and disloyalty to his Government, he speaks from the recesses of his own heart, not mine."

"He puts his own interpretation on the resolution that I offered. That resolution I abide by; but I deny that it authorizes the conclusion the Senator from Massachusetts is forcibly trying to deduce from it; far from it. It however strikes the Senator on this point: he is here an advocate for the interference of the military power at elections, to destroy their freedom, and to appoint to office by the bayonet instead of the free suffrages of the people."

That outrageous and revolutionary and violent sentiment the Senator had the audacity to avow in this Chamber, in substance, a few days before.

"Now, my resolution—its purport, its meaning, its spirit—is, that the people shall rise at the polls and take the power of this Government and of this country, that property belongs to them, there, at that constitutional forum, into their own hands, by peaceful convention; that the people North and the people South shall both do it, and repudiate their war leaders—leaders who desire a continuance of this terrible struggle, and who are opposed to its peaceful settlement."

I want the war to close. I want it to close, as I before said, by a vindication of the constitutional laws and authorities of my country in every foot of our territory. If it cannot close except by war, I am for the continuance of the war to that final result. But unspeakably I prefer that it should close by the peaceable submission of those who are in rebellion to that authority.

"Mr. WILSON. I gave them that counsel in the resolution complained of; I gave them that counsel here, everywhere. The thought of mutiny or disaffection in the Army was not in my mind. How is it with the Senator? If I recollect aright, he stated that his sympathies were with Burns in the Massachusetts insurrection.

"Mr. WILSON. Never.

"Mr. DAVIS. Were you against his rescue?

"Mr. WILSON. I had nothing to do with it."

Oh, what an innocent, unsophisticated, ignorant man!

"Mr. WILSON. I had nothing to do with it; and had no knowledge of it until after it transpired. I was not in my own State at the time.

"Mr. DAVIS. Did you ever condemn that insurrection? Did you ever do anything to put it down—its spirit?

"Mr. WILSON. There was no occasion; it was put down quickly."

Millard Fillmore, one of the noblest, wisest, and most patriotic Presidents that ever filled that office since it was held by him for whom it was organized, Washington—he ordered the soldiers and the marines from the neighboring forts and naval stations, and some of the loyal men of Boston that belonged to uniformed companies committed the crime of volunteering their services on behalf of their Government, the authorities of the United States, to uphold the law of Congress of 1850 against the Massachusetts insurrectionists, against the Massachusetts rebels, and we will see how they were treated presently.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator is mistaken in attributing that to Millard Fillmore; it was Franklin Pierce.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg pardon. It matters not who did the deed. It was a noble one, and I only wish the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] could even approximate to the true loyalty of such deeds.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope I never shall.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; and yet you advance to that seat, (the seat of the President of the Senate,) and with that treason in your heart and upon your lips you take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

"Mr. DAVIS. Did you ever do or say anything to assert the authority of the laws and of the United States in that insurrection? Did you ever express any condemnation of it? No, sir; no."

None that I ever heard of. I do not want to do the Senator from Massachusetts injustice. If I am wrongly informed in relation to his position and his course in the attempt of Massachusetts to put down the fugitive slave law by an armed rebellion, and if I place him in a position in relation to that wicked transgression, for which the leaders ought to have been hung, which is unjust, I desire to be corrected. I want to do him justice, and to absolve his skirts from the smell of treason, if it can be truthfully done.

Well, now, Mr. President, although the Senator was alone when he drew up the indictment, I presume that he had the precaution to take a dictionary and place it in front of him and look out for the meaning of words. He has often told us that he is no lawyer. That was the most superfluous declaration that ever was made by man. I suppose there is no one that would ever entertain the remotest suspicion that he was a lawyer, or ever had been or ever could be. Well, sir, I too have taken up the dictionary, but I did not examine it when I drew up the resolution, and I have looked at the term "revolt." According to Webster—he is mighty good authority with the Senator, I suppose; he is with me, and I believe he is wherever the English language is spoken or written—

"Revolt. To fall off; to turn from one to another; to renounce allegiance and submission to one's prince or State; to reject the authority of one's sovereign."

The Senator has a sovereign at the other end of the avenue. I desire all men to fall off from him and turn to another. I want him to be repudiated at the proper time and in the constitutional mode, and by the proper authority. I want the great sovereign people of America to meet at their elections in November of this year, they who made the Government and for whom the Government was made, and if they heed my exhortation they will fall from the Senator's sovereign and support George B. McClellan, not for the sovereignty, for the constitutional presidency of the United States.

"To reject the authority of their sovereign. To change."

Next I looked to the word "leader," for I suppose these are the two offensive terms, the two suspicious terms, of which a heated imagination and a wicked heart are seeking to infer so much of mischief.

"Leader. One who leads or conducts, a conductor, a chief, a commander, a captain. One who goes first. The chief or heads of a party or faction."

This last is the precise signification, "the chief or heads of a party or faction." Will the Senator confess to the "soft impeachment?" In this sense is he not a leader? Does he not assume to be a leader? Is it not his pride and his glory to be thought a leader? And a war leader, too! Every war faction has its leader. They are not in the Army: Army officers are not factionists; at least they should not be. They ought to be devoted to their Government and their country, the whole people. I know some such true officers, and among them was George B. McClellan and General Thomas. Sir, the appropriate and particular signification and import of the term "revolt" as used in these resolutions is to fall off or turn from one to another; that is the whole of it; and how are they to turn off from one and support another? Not by organizing armies, not by setting squadrons in the field and joining battle, not by making war against their country and their Government, not by adding to the bloody ravages that are now so cruelly desolating this broad land—no, no; but they are peacefully, constitutionally to fall off at the polls from the men that are in power; and if the war cannot be terminated peacefully in any other wise, to go into a constitutional convention and there settle the terms with these almost subjugated people of the South whose land is now desolated by rapine and blood enough to make a heart of adamant itself weep, but never, never to reach such a heart as that of the Senator from Massachusetts. I want the war to cease in this mode. I would not only incur expulsion, but I would incur the direst calamity that human power could inflict upon me if by that sacrifice I could bring this war to such a close by a vindication of the whole power and authority of the Government, and a restoration of peace, fraternity, and happiness among this divided and distracted people.

But the Senator seems to have an image of war floating in his imagination all the time. I do not think he is very critical or correct in the study of language. I do not think he understands it with anything like accuracy. I think his imagination and his heart are perverted. His desire for the further effusion of blood and for further rapine and desolation in this torn country of ours, and his maddened, frenzied desire to bring slavery, against the Constitution and against the laws, to a violent close, so possesses him that he is wholly incapable of anything like a candid and accurate definition and understanding of the phrases which I have used in these resolutions.

It reminds me of an incident that I read of that occurred in the Peninsular war. There was a very spruce colonel that had one of the most tidy regiments in the whole service under the Duke of Wellington. The cleanest clothes, the most polished boots, and the highest burnished arms that were found in the whole army were displayed in his regiment. On one occasion he had his regiment out in review before him. The Senator is a military man; he comprehends the meaning of these terms—I believe it was on what was called "dress parade." In this regiment was a soldier that had been out the evening before—it was probably on Sunday morning—he had been frolicking, and he may have been to an ale-house or groggery—they call them groggeries in the West—or some such place. His clothes were exceedingly muddy, and his hands and his face very much soiled by dirt. The colonel was horror-struck when he saw such a man in such a plight in his crack regiment for all tidiness. He called up an Irish corporal. Said he, "Corporal, take this man and lave him in the Gaudiana." The Irishman was bound to obey the order; he brought up his file of men, seized the offender, and marched him off to the Gaudiana. With a batteau or skiff or some light craft he took him out into the middle of the stream and emptied him into a pool that was about thirty feet deep, and the fellow could not swim a single stroke. He left him; he went back, but without the soldier. The astonished colonel said, "What have you done with the soldier?" "Why," said he, "did not your honor order me to take him and to lave him in the Gaudiana? and by Saint Patrick I have faithfully executed your order." [Laughter.] I think the Senator from Massachusetts labors under some confusion of language, and if he could be laved in the Gaudiana, as that unfortunate soldier was, it would be a good thing well done.

The Senator lives in glass houses himself. He made a speech here on the 3d of February, 1858, from which I will read an extract:

"I think there will soon be a general union in the North as there is now in the South. We are fast coming to it, and let me tell the Senators on the Administration side of this Chamber that if they consummate, if they support, whether they succeed or fail, the bringing of Kansas into the Union, with a knowledge of those monstrous frauds scattered over the land, comprehended by the whole country, they will do more to unite all honest, liberty-loving, God-fearing men in the North than has been accomplished by any act ever done by this Government. Your Kansas-Nebraska policy of 1854 shivered to atoms that great Whig party which had battled sometimes successfully for power here, under the lead of some of the most accomplished statesmen of the country. Another party sprang up—the American party. It paused, it faltered, and it went down under the general judgment of the people of the free States."

I have understood that that Senator got surreptitiously into that party, but I do not know how the fact is.

"The Republican party rose in one year from a few thousand men, and gave at the last presidential election one million three hundred and forty thousand votes. It came much nearer than you wished to do taking control of this Government, of this country. Go on, gentlemen of the slaveholding States, in your avowed policy of slavery expansion and slavery supremacy by forcing Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, against the known will of the people of that Territory, and their earnest appeals to your sense of justice, truth, and honor, and you will arouse the people of the North, already deeply incensed by your policy, by the violence and frauds your creatures have perpetrated in Kansas."

Arouse them to what? Let the Senator speak for himself.

"To rise in the majesty of conscious power, thrust you subserfient allies from power, take the Government, and overthrow forever you and your policy. I tell you here to-day that your support of this gigantic crime against the liberties of the people of Kansas is bringing upon you the condemnation of the country and the world."

That was the language of the Senator. What did he threaten? You go on in your career of slavery propagandism and you will unite the whole people of the North, and they will come here to your capital, and they will thrust from place the men who fill office. But I have given the Senator's exact language; it is stronger than mine.

There is the most distinct and emphatic threat on the part of this constitutional and order-loving Senator to arouse and array his own party, the united people of the North, to march here upon the capital and thrust Buchanan and his Administration from office, take possession of the Government themselves, and forever annihilate the party and the power that then held possession of the Government. And yet the Senator gets up and moves my expulsion for having used in the resolutions that have been read to the Senate the terms that I have already commented upon. While I had the dictionary in my hand I looked at the word "thrust," and I found that it means "to push or drive with force; to drive; to force; to impel." What, then, is the language of the Senator? "You may vote for these measures and pass them as laws according to the forms of the Constitution; but if you do vote for them the consequence will be that you will unite the whole North against you, and they will become so indignant, so outraged, so exasperated, that in a body they will rise in the omnipotence of their power and move upon the capital and thrust Buchanan, forcibly drive Buchanan and his Administration from the Government, and take possession of it themselves." And yet the Senator has the audacity of himself, consulting with his own mighty self and nobody else, to introduce a resolution to expel me for having used words not as significant of violence and force and of a subversion of the Constitution as he himself used in this Chamber in the year 1858.

Mr. President, there is no truer advocate for this war than I am; but to carry on the war successfully on our part I will never consent to offer up the Constitution and the liberties of my country as the sacrifice. There is no need for it. If Millard Fillmore had been President, with his statesmanship we should have had far different results. He was an anti-slavery man when he was elevated to the Presidency. I had the happiness to serve four years with him in Congress.

I was on terms of familiar friendship with him, and I know the depth and the truth of his feelings and his sentiments against slavery. But, sir, when he was elevated to that august office of President he rose to the elevated plane of true, broad, comprehensive, and constitutional statesmanship. He gave the country one of the truest, wisest, noblest, and most successful administrations of the Government that it has ever had. If it had been his fortune to be reelected to the Presidency we should never have had this great war. If he had been in the presidential chair at the beginning of this unfortunate rebellion, a few months of his wise, patriotic, able, and constitutional administration of the Government would have created a Union party in the seceded States much larger than the rebels, and would have long since brought them back to the fold of the Union and the Constitution.

God, however, ordered it otherwise, no doubt wisely, in His inscrutable providence. We have nothing to do but to bow submissively and reverentially to the fiat.

But the war came. I understand that a regiment was organized in the city of Boston who did the Senator the honor to name him as the colonel. He very promptly sported his regimentals and displayed an eagle upon each shoulder. He had himself belted to a sword about as long as the Spartan son desired from his mother, and with that maiden blade all unfleshed, he moved to the park on a certain occasion to hear a congratulatory address from one of the finest orators and truest men and gentlemen in that city. He heard an eloquent address and received the salutations of all Boston, and from there he moved to this capital to cross the river and to carry conquest and slaughter into the rebel camp. When the Senator came here I understand he was called colonel, he bore the insignia of colonel, but whether he had dubbed himself colonel or was a "sure enough" colonel, as the children say, I believe history has not yet written. I understand that a brigade band was called out to welcome the coming hero to this city, preliminary to his marching across the Potomac, and in martial strains as the warlike hero approached, they played "Hail to the chief," clear the way! "Dahoussie, great god of war," is going to battle and to victory. He went across the river and was in the neighborhood of the first battle of Bull Run; I do not know whether he was in that battle or not, but I suppose that at a very convenient and safe distance behind the rear lines he took his position upon some lofty eminence to overlook the battle-field. The battle commenced, and soon unfortunately ended in the rout and defeat and confusion of our gallant troops, who had been prematurely urged, before they were prepared for the conflict, "on to Richmond." The discomfited hosts began their flight, and as wave succeeded wave toward this city, foremost among the flying, I have been informed, was the Senator from Massachusetts. I am told he did run like "a white head."

There was a brave and a gallant man on that field who has had four sons in the Army, one of whom fell in that disastrous fight mortally wounded. The father saw the flying hero all the way from Boston making tracks as hard as he could move toward Washington city, and stopped him and besought him to go with him to have his bleeding and dying and gallant son brought off. The reply was, "No, sir; no, sir; this is a time when every man must take care of himself," and he went on like a streak of lightning. Whether he crossed the Long Bridge, or got into a boat, or swam the majestic Potomac, I am not informed. At any rate he made a safe return to Washington, and that demonstration of the hero satisfied him that he was not altogether a fit man for the battle-field, and somehow or other he doffed his regimentals and his commission.

When I was a boy, Mr. President, there used to be, as there always is, a quarrel between town boys and country boys. It always has been so, and I believe always will be so. On some election occasion, or other public day, the country boys had rallied in great force in my native town, expressly to whip the town boys, and we were summoning all of our boys for the struggle. We made out our list, called the roll, and one well-grown boy came up and said, "Boys, you must excuse me on this occasion." "Why?" "Why," said he, "I am too fat to fight." The Senator from Massachusetts was not too fat to fight, but he had a much worse infirmity.

Mr. Clay was a man of general genius, and a patriot, and a statesman above all praise. In the dark hour of 1812, when our commerce was about to be swept from the ocean by British orders in council, and Berlin and Milan decrees, that unequaled orator and patriot rallied the heart of his country, then in a state of infancy, to strike for the freedom of the seas and for free trade and sailors' rights. Mr. Madison proposed to make him a general, to place him high in command, a major general in the field, and I have no doubt a few months' experience would have made him an officer and a commander of the very first ability; but his friends, and the friends of the country, besought him, told him that his presence and his services and his inspiring eloquence were more advantageous and necessary to his country in the House of Representatives, in the council, than in the field, and exhorted him to continue in that position. I suppose that the Senator from Massachusetts had also his friends who beset him and who told him that his services here in the Senate as leader, as overseer, were more useful than they would be in the field. I have seen negroes upon sugar plantations and cotton plantations that were foremen. They were called drivers. These gentlemen persuaded the Senator that he would be much more efficacious and valuable as driver of the Senate than he would be as commander in the field, and I reckon he was the most easily persuaded man that ever was beset with argument or importunities.

The Senator can scarcely get up without throwing some reproach at my State, or some reproach at the disloyalty of that State, or some other State. He is constantly at it. Ought not a man who is thus flaunting on all occasions the disloyalty of others, and his own devotion to his Government and to the Union and the Constitution, to be like Cæsar's wife, above suspicion? We all recollect the Burns case and the insurrection in Massachusetts. I hold a volume of the laws of that State in my hand. At page 278 there is "An act to protect the rights and liberties of the people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts," passed in 1855, but before I read that, I will read a few sections of the fugitive slave law, passed by Congress in 1850:

That law in its first two or three sections provided for the appointment of commissioners to authorize the arrest and reclamation of fugitive slaves upon certain conditions, upon the pursuit of the owner or his agent, and to be taken back to the State from whence they escaped. I will read some of its sections:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the commissioners above named shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States, in their respective circuits and districts within the several States, and the judges of the superior courts of the Territories, severally and collectively, in term-time and vacation; and shall grant certificates to such claimants, upon satisfactory proof being made, with authority to take and remove such fugitives from service or labor, under the restrictions herein contained, to the State or Territory from which such persons may have escaped or fled.

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of all marshals and deputy marshals to obey and execute all warrants and precepts issued under the provisions of this act, when to them directed; and should any marshal or deputy marshal refuse to receive such warrant or other process when tendered, or to use all proper means diligently to execute the same, he shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in the sum of $1,000, to the use of such claimant, on the motion of such claimant, by the circuit or district court for the district of such marshal; and after the arrest of such fugitive by such marshal or his deputy, or while at any time in his custody, under the provisions of this act, should such fugitive escape, whether with or without the assent of such marshal or his deputy, such marshal shall be liable, on his official bond, to be prosecuted for the benefit of such claimant, for the full value of the service or labor of said fugitive in the State, Territory, or district whence he escaped; and the better to enable the said commissioners, when thus appointed, to execute their duties faithfully and efficiently, in conformity with the requirements of the Constitution of the United States and of this act, they are hereby authorized and empowered, within their counties respectively, to appoint, in writing under their hands, any one or more suitable persons, from time to time, to execute all such warrants and other process as may be issued by them in the lawful performance of their respective duties, with authority to such commissioners, or the persons to be appointed by them, to execute process as aforesaid, to summon and call to their aid the bystanders or posse comitatus of the proper county when necessary to insure a faithful observance of the clause of the Constitution referred to, in conformity with the provisions of this act; and all good citizens are hereby commanded to aid and assist in the prompt and efficient execution of this law whenever their services may be required, as aforesaid, for that purpose; and said warrants shall run and be executed by said officers anywhere in the State within which they are sued.

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That when a person held to service or labor in any State or Territory of the United States has heretofore or shall hereafter escape into another State or Territory of the United States, the person or persons to whom such service or labor may be due, or his, her, or their attorney duly authorized by power in writing acknowledged and certified under the seal of some legal officer or court of the State or Territory in which the same may be executed, may pursue and reclaim such fugitive person, either by procuring a warrant from some one of the courts, judges, or commissioners aforesaid, of the proper circuit, district, or county for the apprehension of such fugitive from service or labor, or by seizing and arresting such fugitive where the same can be done without process, and by taking or causing such person to be taken forthwith before such court, judge, or commissioner, whose duty it shall be to hear and determine the case of such claimant in a summary manner."

"and upon satisfactory proof being made, by deposition or affidavit in writing, to be taken and certified by such court, judge, or commissioner, or by other satisfactory testimony duly taken and certified by some court, magistrate, justice of the peace, or other legal officer authorized to administer an oath and take depositions under the laws of the State or Territory from which such person owing service or labor may have escaped, with a certificate of such magistracy or other authority as aforesaid, with the seal of the proper court or officer thereto attached, which seal shall be sufficient to establish the competency of the proof, and with proof, also by affidavit, of the identity of the person whose service or labor is claimed to be due as aforesaid, that the person so arrested does in fact owe service or labor to the person or persons claiming him or her, in the State or Territory from which such fugitive may have escaped as aforesaid, and that said person escaped, to make out and deliver to such claimants, his or her agent or attorney, a certificate setting forth the substantial facts as to the service or labor due from such fugitive to the claimant, and of his or her escape from the State or Territory in which he or she was arrested, with authority to such claimant or his or her agent or attorney to use such reasonable force and restraint as may be necessary under the circumstances of the case to take and remove such fugitive person back to the State or Territory whence he or she may have escaped as aforesaid. In no trial or hearing under this act shall the testimony of such alleged fugitive be admitted in evidence; and the certificates in this and the fourth section mentioned shall be conclusive of the right of the person or persons in whose favor granted, to remove such fugitive to the State or Territory from which he escaped, and shall prevent all molestation of such person or persons by any process issued by any court, judge, magistrate, or other person whomsoever.

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall knowingly and willingly obstruct, hinder, or prevent such claimant, his agent or attorney, or any person or persons lawfully assisting him, her, or them, from arresting such a fugitive from service or labor, either with or without process as aforesaid, or shall rescue, or attempt to rescue, such fugitive from service or labor, from the custody of such claimants, his or her agent or attorney, or other person or persons lawfully assisting as aforesaid, when so arrested, pursuant to the authority herein given and declared; or shall aid, abet, or assist such person so owing service or labor as aforesaid, directly or indirectly, to escape from such claimant, his agent or attorney, or other person or persons legally authorized as aforesaid; or shall harbor or conceal such fugitive, so as to prevent the discovery and arrest of such person, after notice or knowledge of the fact that such person was a fugitive from service or labor as aforesaid, shall, for either of said offenses, be subject to a fine not exceeding $1,000 and imprisonment not exceeding six months, by indictment and conviction before the district court of the United States for the district in which such offense may have been committed, or before the proper court of criminal jurisdiction, if committed within any one of the organized Territories of the United States; and shall moreover forfeit and pay, by way of civil damages to the party injured by such illegal conduct, the sum of $1,000 for each fugitive so lost as aforesaid, to be recovered by action of debt, in any of the district or territorial courts aforesaid, within whose jurisdiction the said offense may have been committed.

"Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That when any person held to service or labor in any State or Territory, or in the District of Columbia, shall escape therefrom, the party to whom such service or labor shall be due, his, her, or their agent or attorney, may apply to any court of record therein, or judge thereof in vacation, and make satisfactory proof to such court, or judge in vacation, of the escape aforesaid, and that the person escaping owed service or labor to such party. Whereupon the court shall cause a record to be made of the matters so proved, and also a general description of the person so escaping, with such convenient certainty as may be; and a transcript of such record, authenticated by the attestation of the clerk of the seal of the said court, being produced in any other State, Territory, or District in which the person so escaping may be found, and being exhibited to any judge, commissioner, or other officer authorized by the law of the United States to cause persons escaping from service or labor to be delivered up, shall be held and taken to be full and conclusive evidence of the fact of escape, and that the service or labor of the person escaping is due to the party in such record mentioned."

Well, now, Mr. President, here was a careful and a well-arranged law passed by the Congress of the United States to enable the owners of fugitive slaves to rescue them from other States. I have the decision of the Supreme Court rendered by Judge Story, and accorded to by every judge upon that bench, establishing this position, that under the Constitution and laws of Congress, wherever a slave escapes from one State to another, the owner or his agent authorized by parol may pursue the slave into any State in the United States, and reclaim him wherever he can do it without a breach of the peace. I have four or five decisions of Judge McLean to the same effect. I may append them to these remarks, and probably will. I may read them before I get through if I am not too much exhausted.

But then comes the State of Massachusetts, after Burris had been rescued first from the marshal and the authorities of the United States, and in the rescue a man in the service of the Government was slain by the insurgents. When that rebellion was put down by a patriotic President, who regarded his oath, the obligation which the laws and the Constitution imposed upon him, Massachusetts, this pestilent and rebellious State of Massachusetts, passes an elaborate law specially to neutralize and defeat this fugitive slave law. In 1787, when the present Constitution was in its cradle, she signaled and gave promise of her future history by her action at that time in Shay's rebellion. In the war of 1812 she was covered all over with treason. Her executive, her legislative departments, her municipal officers, her population, or the great mass of it, sympathized with England, and held out blue lights to guide her ships into the ports lying along that rocky coast. Governor Strong issued his proclamation that the militia of Massachusetts should not be moved out of the State when they were ordered to Plattsburg. I may be mistaken—

Mr. COLLAMER. Not the Massachusetts militia.

Mr. DAVIS. It may have been Governor Chittenden, of Vermont.

Mr. COLLAMER. Governor Chittenden made that order.

Mr. DAVIS. At any rate Governor Strong protested against the war. I stand corrected by the Senator.

Mr. COLLAMER. I merely corrected the Senator in reference to the battle of Plattsburg. I believe the Governor of Massachusetts did refuse to allow the militia to go out of the State at all, but not as to Plattsburg.

Mr. DAVIS. That is my recollection. They were not ordered to Plattsburg, but he issued a proclamation to that effect generally. When the gallant Lawrence fell upon the bloody deck of the Chesapeake, and his remains were brought into Salem, one of the officers of Massachusetts issued his prohibition to some municipal authorities from taking part in his funeral. Sir, you had your Essex Junto; you had your Hartford Convention; you had a proposition that the thirteen original colonies should make peace of themselves and by themselves in that State. There was not a day in the prosecution of that war that there was not a great and atrocious demonstration of treason in Massachusetts. That war was declared and waged by the United States, as I said before, to vindicate free trade and sailors' rights, the rights of Massachusetts shippers and seamen and merchants upon the highway of nations, and this was rightfully waged; and yet here is that State sympathizing with and giving aid and comfort to the enemy, denouncing and vilifying its own Government, doing everything it could do to defeat its war measures, and giving all the assistance it could, short of participating in the contest, to the British.

Sir, I was opposed to the Kansas and Nebraska bill. I was against the Lecompton constitution. I denounced those measures. I was opposed to the Mexican war, the annexation of Texas, by the mode in which it was effected. Where would the Senator have been if he had occupied my local position I cannot say. At the time of the annexation of Texas the honorable Vice President of the United States and myself were members of the House of Representatives, and of the same committee. We were in the committee-room one morning investigating the contested election of Jones and Botts, from the Richmond (Virginia) district. The Vice President, then a member of that committee, came in, and some gentleman asked him how Maine stood upon the subject of the annexation of Texas, and the honorable Vice President answered, "She is against it as square as a brick."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The Chair feels obliged to remind the Senator from Kentucky that personal allusions to the Vice President of the United States, the regular stated occupant of this chair, are not in order, founded upon the reason that his position does not give him the privilege of reply.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg the Vice President's pardon, and I beg the pardon of the Chair, and of the Senate, and I shall trespass so no more. Such a rule as that is certainly proper, and I submit to it promptly and cheerfully, and I hope to be excused by the Vice President.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator from Kentucky would prefer to close his argument to-morrow, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. I am obliged to the Senator; but I have not much more to say, and would rather conclude this evening.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator prefers to conclude his argument now, I will not make the motion; but I thought he was somewhat fatigued.

Mr. DAVIS. I stand corrected by the Chair, and for its courtesy and gentlemanly manner of making the correction I return to the Chair my most sincere thanks.

But I was about to say a word in relation to the annexation of Texas. If I recollect aright—I am not certain—the present occupant of the chair was then in the other House, and voted against the joint resolution of annexation. I did, and I spoke against it. What did Massachusetts do? Her Legislature got together and passed a resolution that the annexation of Texas amounted to a dissolution of the Union, and that she had a right to secede. That was it, in substance. I do not recollect it precisely. If that is not accurate, I should like to be corrected. The Lord knows I do not want to make any groundless charge against Massachusetts. She has greatly more now than she can ever account for in this world. [Laughter.] I do not intend to raise any false clamor against her; but she certainly passed a resolution of that purport.

While I am up I desire to refer to a little matter in reference to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] I have lately seen a notice of the report of a gentleman from Glasgow, Scotland, who was in our country propagating abolitionism, and he happened to meet with the Senator from Massachusetts. I have seen the publication in the newspapers. They were discoursing, I suppose, on the prospect of the utter annihilation of slavery in the United States. The honorable Senator is represented to have expressed the belief that the success of our armies was too rapid and too decided at present for the final and thorough abolition of slavery. We do not know what to believe and what not to believe in these times; but I cannot hear anything of that kind of the honorable gentleman that I do not give my hearty belief to, without, perhaps, having authority for so doing. He is represented as having said that if the tide of success continued it would bring our people to a disposition to make too early a peace. The inference is that peace may be made so precipitately that it will leave some remnants of slavery in the southern States; that he did not wish our success to be so rapid or so decisive; that he desired that our armies should meet with a few reverses; that the war might be protracted in order that the final destruction of slavery might become the more certain.

Mr. SUMNER. It is an entire misapprehension. I never said any such thing.

Mr. DAVIS. I am very much gratified to hear the Senator disclaim it. I accept his disclaimer. It is so seldom that he has an opportunity to make any about a matter of that kind that it affords me infinite pleasure that he has it now. [Laughter.]

I understand, however, that both the honorable Senators from Massachusetts were advocates of the law to defeat the fugitive slave law of 1850, and I will read some of its provisions. It is entitled, "An act to protect the rights and liberties of the people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts."

The second section is in these words: "The meaning of the one hundred and eleventh chapter of the Revised Statutes is hereby declared to be that every person imprisoned or restrained of his liberty is entitled, as of right and of course, to the writ of habeas corpus, except in the cases mentioned in the second section of that chapter."

That law was made for the negro. Now the case of the white man comes up, and how is it? You, gentlemen, were advocates for a law that gave the writ of habeas corpus to the fugitive slave who was pursued into Massachusetts, according to the provisions of the act of 1850, and reclaimed in strict conformity to it, which act denied to him the writ of habeas corpus by saying his case should be summarily examined after a particular manner, and if he was found upon the proof then furnished, in conformity to that law, to be a fugitive slave, he should be immediately handed over to his owner, or to his agent, and be taken out of the State. These gentlemen are deep and noisy in their sympathy with the negro; so much so that they sustain a law to negative, to practically repeal a law of Congress which every judge of every United States court, district and associate, of the Supreme Court, has declared to be constitutional. It was made in conformity to an express provision of the Constitution, and that provision was adopted by the members of the Convention that framed it by a unanimous vote. There was not a dissenting vote in that Convention to the provision in relation to the reclamation of fugitive slaves. The first law on that subject was passed in 1793. It was approved of by Washington. It was executed in the State of Pennsylvania, as decided in the case of Prigg vs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, against a positive law of that State. It has been sustained by the whole judicial force, circuit and district, of the United States. It was executed in Boston by President Franklin Pierce; and I do not believe it would be executed now by the present incumbent even if the country were at peace. I had not expected so much from President Pierce; but it merely proves how much better a Democratic President is than the incumbent now in office. Notwithstanding these high sanctions of this law, the State of Massachusetts passed a law right in the teeth of all the provisions of this act of Congress of 1850 that negatives and neutralizes every provision of that law:

"Sec. 4. The supreme judicial court, or any justice of said court before whom the writ of habeas corpus shall be made returnable, shall, on the application of any party to the proceeding, order a trial by jury as to any facts stated in the return of the officer, or as to any facts alleged, if it shall appear by the return of the officer or otherwise that the person, whose restraint or imprisonment is in question, is claimed to be held to service or labor in another State, and to have escaped from such service or labor, and may admit said person to bail in a sum not exceeding $2,000. In such case issue may be joined by a general denial of the facts alleged, the plea may be not guilty, and the jury shall have the right to return a general verdict, and the same discretion as juries have in the trial of criminal cases; and the finding of a verdict of not guilty shall be final and conclusive."

"Sec. 5. The court or justice before whom the writ of habeas corpus is returnable, shall, unless a jury is already in attendance, by warrant, command the sheriff of the county, or his deputy, to summon a jury in the manner provided in the twenty-fourth chapter of the Revised Statutes, to attend at the time and place stated in the warrant, at which time and place they shall be impaneled, and, having selected a foreman by ballot, the issue so framed shall be put to them for their determination. In case one jury shall disagree, the issue may be submitted to the other jury, or continued to the next term, at the discretion of the court. And in every case of disagreement another jury may be summoned and qualified as above provided, forthwith or at a future day, in the discretion of the court or justice before whom the writ is returned, until a verdict shall finally be rendered upon the issue. If any person summoned as a juror as aforesaid shall fail to attend without sufficient cause, he shall pay a fine of fifty dollars. And if, by reason of challenges or otherwise, there shall not be a full jury of the persons summoned, the officer attending the hearing shall return some suitable person or persons to supply the deficiency."

"Sec. 6. If any claimant shall appear to demand the custody or possession of the person for whose benefit said writ is sued out, such claimant shall state in writing the facts on which he relies with precision and certainty; and neither the claimant of the alleged fugitive, nor any person interested in his alleged obligation to service or labor, nor the alleged fugitive, shall be permitted to testify at the trial of the issue; and no confessions, admissions, or declarations of the alleged fugitive against himself shall be given in evidence. Upon every question of fact involved in the issue the burden of proof shall be on the claimant, and the facts alleged and necessary to be established must be proved by the testimony of at least two credible witnesses, or other legal evidence equivalent thereto, and by the rules of evidence known and secured by the common law; and no ex parte deposition or affidavit shall be received in proof in behalf of the claimant, and no presumption shall arise in favor of the claimant from any proof that the alleged fugitive or any of his ancestors had been actually held as a slave, without proof that such holding was legal."

"Sec. 7. If any person shall remove from the limits of this Commonwealth, or shall assist in removing therefrom, or shall come into the Commonwealth with the intention of removing or of assisting in the removing therefrom, or shall procure or assist in procuring to be so removed, any person, being in the peace thereof, who is not 'held to service or labor' by the 'party' making 'claim,' or who has not 'escaped' from the 'party' making 'claim,' or whose 'service or labor' is not 'due' to the 'party' making 'claim,' within the meaning of those words in the Constitution of the United States, on the pretense that such person is so held or has so escaped, or that his 'service or labor' is so 'due,' or with the intent to subject him to such 'service or labor,' he shall be punished by a fine not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and by imprisonment in the State prison not less than one nor more than five years.

"Sec. 8. Any person sustaining wrong or injury, by any proceeding punishable by the preceding section, may maintain an action and recover damages therefor in any court competent to try the same.

"Sec. 9. No person, while holding any office of honor, trust, or emolument under the laws of this Commonwealth, shall, in any capacity, issue any warrant or other process, or grant any certificate, under or by virtue of an act of Congress approved the 12th day of February, in the year 1793, entitled 'An act respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters,' or under or by virtue of an act of Congress approved the 18th day of September, in the year 1850, entitled 'An act to amend, and supplementary to, "An act respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters," or shall, in any capacity, serve any such warrant or other process.

"Sec. 10. Any person, who shall grant any certificate under or by virtue of the acts of Congress mentioned in the preceding section, shall be deemed to have resigned any commission from the Commonwealth which he may possess, his office shall be deemed vacant, and he shall be forever thereafter ineligible to any office of trust, honor, or emolument under the laws of this Commonwealth.

"Sec. 11. Any person who shall act as counsel or attorney for any claimant of any alleged fugitive from service or labor, under or by virtue of the acts of Congress mentioned in the ninth section of this act, shall be deemed to have resigned any commission from the Commonwealth that he may possess, and he shall be thereafter incapacitated from appearing as counsel or attorney in the courts of this Commonwealth.

"Sec. 12. The two preceding sections shall not apply to removal from judicial office; but if either of the actions there specified shall be performed by any person holding judicial office under this Commonwealth, it shall be considered as a violation of good behavior, as well as a reason for loss of public confidence, and as furnishing sufficient ground either for impeachment or for removal by address.

"Sec. 13. No person who holds any office under the laws of the United States which qualifies him to issue any warrant or other process, or to grant any certificate under the acts of Congress named in the ninth section of this act, or to serve the same, shall at the same time hold any office of honor, trust, or emolument under the laws of this Commonwealth.

"Sec. 14. Any person holding any judicial office under the constitution or laws of this Commonwealth who shall continue, for ten days after the passage of this act, to hold the office of United States commissioner, or any office under the laws of the United States which qualifies him to issue any warrant or other process, or grant any certificate under the acts of Congress named in the ninth section of this act, shall be deemed to have violated good behavior, to have given reason for loss of public confidence, and furnish sufficient ground either for impeachment or for removal by address.

"Sec. 15. Any sheriff, deputy sheriff, jailor, coroner, constable, or other officer of this Commonwealth, or the police of any city or town, or any district, county, city, or town officer, or any officer or other member of the volunteer militia of this Commonwealth, who shall hereafter arrest, imprison, detain, or return, or aid in arresting, imprisoning, detaining, or returning, any person, for the reason that he is claimed or adjudged to be a fugitive from service or labor, shall be punished by fine not less than $1,000 and not exceeding $2,000, and by imprisonment in the State prison for not less than one nor more than two years.

"Sec. 16. The volunteer militia of this Commonwealth shall not act in any manner in the seizure, detention, or rendition of any person for the reason that he is claimed or adjudged to be a fugitive from service or labor. Any member of the same who shall offend against the provisions of this section shall be punished by fine not less than $1,000 and not exceeding $2,000, and by imprisonment in the State prison for not less than one nor more than two years.

"Sec. 17. The Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Council, shall appoint in every county one or more commissioners, learned in the law, whose duty it shall be, in their respective counties, when any person in this State is arrested or seized, or in danger of being arrested or seized, as a fugitive from service or labor, on being informed thereof, diligently and faithfully to use all lawful means to protect, defend, and secure to such alleged fugitive a fair and impartial trial by jury, and the benefits of the provisions of this act; and any attorney whose services are desired by the alleged fugitive may also act as counsel in the case.

"Sec. 18. The commissioners shall defray all expenses of witnesses, clerks' fees, and officers' fees, and other expenses which may be incurred in the protection and defense of any person seized or arrested as a fugitive from service or labor; and the same, together with the reasonable charges of the commissioners for their services as attorneys and counsel in the case, shall be paid by the State treasurer, on a warrant to be issued by the Governor.

"Sec. 19. No jail, prison, or other place of confinement belonging to or used by either the Commonwealth of Massachusetts or any county therein, shall be used for the detention or imprisonment of any person accused or convicted of any offense created by either of the said acts of Congress mentioned in the ninth section of this act, or accused or convicted of obstructing or resisting any process, warrant, or order, issued under either of said acts, or of rescuing, or attempting to rescue, any person arrested or detained under any of the provisions of either of said acts, nor for the imprisonment of any person arrested on mesne process, or on execution in any suit for damages or penalties accruing, or being claimed to accrue, in consequence of any aid rendered to any escaping fugitive from service or labor.

"Sec. 20. All the provisions of law as to the writ of habeas corpus, heretofore existing and in force, so far as aplicable, and so far as not hereby changed, shall apply to the cases arising under this act.

"Sec. 21. Nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to so much of the act of the 12th of February, 1793, as relates to fugitives from justice.

"Sec. 22. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

"Sec. 23. This act shall take effect from and after its passage."

Now, here is one of the Senators from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] who avows openly and boldly, if I understand him, that he is and was always against the execution of the fugitive slave law. Here is the other one furiously trying to evade the question. I have heard that he was an advocate for this law of his State from which I have read. If it is not so, he has now time and opportunity to disavow it; if he does not disavow it, he must hereafter hold his peace, and the country will receive it as true. Then, sir, here we have revealed two higher-law men. What is this higher law? The Constitution of the United States says that that instrument, and all laws and treaties made in pursuance of it, shall be the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. This law of Congress was executed in Boston, the metropolis of New England, and thereupon that State deliberately, wickedly, defiantly passes an elaborate law to defeat every provision of the fugitive slave law; and now the two Senators from Massachusetts—higher-law men, men who believe that there is a higher law than the Constitution and the laws of Congress, and which they claim the right to institute for themselves, after sustaining and supporting this law of Massachusetts, and doing everything, I suppose, that they could do to make it practically dominant and overthrow the law of Congress—they come up here and are admitted to seats in this body, and they walk up to your chair, sir, and take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. Sir, I ask the Senator who so flippantly, without, I suppose, understanding the force of his words, charges perjury upon the lips of so many, and such better men than himself, to examine his own heart, his own conscience, and to answer this body what crime does he commit, after sustaining this law of Massachusetts, when he comes up here and takes an oath to support the Constitution which the law of his State pro tanto subverts? It seems to me that any sense of decency, of justice, any moral sense, should impel men who occupy that position to shrink back from making such charges against others.

That Senator, from the time almost that I first took my seat in this body, and particularly from the time I invoked the constitutional guarantee for slavery, has been making imputations against my loyalty and against the loyalty of my State. Sir, I would scorn to defend either against such charges from that source. But he sets himself up as the conservator of the Senate, its purity, its loyalty, and its devotion to the Constitution. Colonel Pride set himself up as the purgator of the Long Parliament. I do not know whether the Senator belongs to the Puritan race or not, but I should suppose, if he does, from his propensity to purge the Senate, that he was a lineal descendant of the notorious Colonel Pride. I do not know whether the Senator is of that stock. I do not know what stock he is of—very good stock, maybe—but sometimes I almost imagine he is an Ishmaelite from his propensity to war with everybody; and then again, from some of his propensities, I think he may be a gipsy; and then again I come to the conclusion that I cannot even conjecture what is his extraction.

I had not been in this body many days before I received an anonymous letter in relation to the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not pay any attention to anonymous letters, and I believe that they generally stand discredited. That is the judgment I pass upon them. I read but few of them. I told an honorable Senator in the body at the time of the anonymous letter I had received in relation to the Senator from Massachusetts, and that I did not believe it. I do not now believe it; but these are strange times, and we do not know what is true and what is false. It charged him with claiming to be colonel of a regiment and with having made a proposition to sell the place of sutler for one half the profits. I suppose—I do not however know—that other Senators received a similar communication. I did not believe it then;

I do not believe it now; for whatever might have been the moral principle of the Senator, I thought he would have been much too prudent to expose himself to such a disclosure. From the revelations made in this body a few days since concerning the thieving and plundering, wholesale and retail, in this great Government of ours in this time of war and adversity, a man cannot conjecture what is true and what is not true.

Mr. President, I have not had time, from the notice I have taken of the Senator from Massachusetts, to discuss the principles of my resolutions. When they have been assailed by all comers who may choose to assail them I shall endeavor to defend them; but upon my defense of them I will proudly put myself in judgment before this Senate. I quail not from this investigation. I court any scrutiny the Senate may put upon the principles of those resolutions. I abide by them; and if I cannot maintain my position here upon their truth and their principle, I know a country in which, and I know a people before whom, I can maintain myself, and I will appeal from this forum to that one. But when the principles of these resolutions are assailed by any gentleman or all gentlemen, I shall be ready to defend them as best I can. I will say furthermore that when there is a fair and proper blow to be aimed at the dangerous abuse of power by this Administration or by any Administration when I was an actor upon the public theater, I was always ready to strike it a blow—not a strong one, but as willing a blow as any man could give it.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to notice in detail the illogical, rambling, and incoherent utterances that the Senate has been forced to listen to for nearly three hours. Seldom has the Senate of the United States been compelled to listen to such a farrago of brutality, indecency, treason, and falsehood. This exhibition, that we have been forced to witness for three weary hours, would not elevate even the Senator in a Kentucky barbecue; it will, if possible, sink him to a lower level in the Senate of the United States. Arraigned before the Senate for calling upon the people to revolt against the administrators of the Government, take its powers into their own hands, go into a national convention, end the war, and reconstruct the Government in defiance of the Constitution, the laws, and the executive, legislative, and judicial authorities, he rises and babbles through nearly three hours, till the ear of the Senate grows weary with his loose, disjointed mutterings. The Senator tells us he has been informed of this, and he has heard that, and that he has received anonymous communications. He rises here in the Senate of the United States, flippantly speaks of States and of public men, bringing against States and public men false and vituperative accusations, on the authority of what he has heard and what he has been informed of; swift to accuse, fierce, bitter, and unrelenting in denunciation, reckless alike of facts and the deencies that should govern honorable men, he does not pause to examine the character of the tattle poured into his ear, which seems to be the receptacle of the foulest calumnies against those whose high duty it is to administer in these days of trial the Government of the United States. The receiver of anonymous communications, he has the indecency to drag them out in the Senate, in the face of men who recognize the proprieties that should regulate the action of gentlemen.

I repeat, sir, it is not my purpose to notice the rambling and incoherent utterances of the Senator from Kentucky, nor to notice his indecent flings and personal allusions. If he is content with the exhibition he has made of himself today, I surely ought to be content. No, sir, I shall not follow the Senator in all his idle, rambling, and discursive utterances, for I might as well attempt to follow the twitterings of a cock snowbird. But there are two or three accusations of a personal nature that demand from me a notice here and now. The Senator from Kentucky has been informed, he tells us, that when the war commenced I received the command of a Massachusetts regiment, marched it to Washington, went to Bull Run, and when the battle was lost hastily left the field, refusing to help away a soldier wounded in the fight. The Senator was informed of this, but he took no time to examine into the truth or falsity of his information; but the Senator in this is quite as accurate as he generally is in his vituperative accusations against some of the noblest men of our time. Sir, I will put the Senator right, and I have abundant means to put him right in the evidence of honorable Senators around me.

A day or two before the battle of Bull Run, the first regiment of Massachusetts volunteers was engaged with the enemy at Blackburn's ford, and several Massachusetts men were killed or wounded. Intensely anxious to learn what I could do for the relief of Massachusetts men, wounded in defense of my country, I hastened to the army. I saw several of the wounded men of my own and other States at Centreville; and there are those present in this Chamber who know that they and myself were privileged to administer something to their relief. When the army advanced from Centreville on that July morning, I followed it to the field, anxious, if I could, to do something to alleviate the sufferings of the men who might fall that day. I went on to that field of strife. At three of the field hospitals I did something, with other civilians, for our wounded and our dying. When our forces drove the enemy, as they did drive the enemy, and the battle had ceased for a time, and there was no firing on any part of the field, I, only a civilian, with no assigned duty, left the command of General Schenck, where I had passed some time, and retraced my steps to Centreville. On my way back I met the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] on their way to the battle-field, and told them that we had driven the enemy, and won a brilliant victory. The Senator from Iowa will, I am sure, remember it. (Mr. GRIMES nodded assent.) When I arrived at Centreville the battle had been renewed by the arrival on the field of fresh rebel forces from the Shenandoah valley. It was rumored, and the rumor created no little excitement, that our army had been defeated and was falling back. The Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] will remember that I stoutly denied the truth of the rumor, and contended that I had seen our army drive the enemy before them. I had no means of conveyance for myself, a wounded soldier, or anybody else, and after lingering a while at Centreville, I started on foot, and walked several miles toward Washington, and was indebted to the kindness of a gentleman from Pennsylvania for the means of conveyance to this city. I had no occasion to hasten my steps, and did not do so; if, however, that had been necessary, I can assure the Senator from Kentucky that I should not have hesitated to do so. The men who fell that day were not at Centreville or on the road from Centreville to Washington, and no appeal was made to me, or could have been made to me, in behalf of a wounded or any other soldier. Did the Senator manufacture that libelous accusation?

Mr. DAVIS. It was told me by a soldier, though.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator was told so. Sir, whoever told the Senator so, told him an unmitigated and unqualified lie, that had not a semblance or shadow of truth in it.

Sir, a few weeks after the disaster of Bull Run, the President and his Cabinet were anxious to stimulate and encourage volunteering. On the adjournment of Congress, at the urgent solicitations of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of War, I hastened home to Massachusetts to encourage recruiting for the Army. I had been invited by General McClellan to accept a position on his staff, and the Secretary of War urgently pressed me to do so. I thought, and the Secretary thought, that I could obtain in that position some knowledge of the organization and condition of the Army that would be of service to my country. Believing that I could render some service to my country before the meeting of Congress, I went home to Massachusetts, appealed to the people, traversed portions of the State at my own expense, organized and raised nineteen companies of infantry, two batteries of artillery, and a company of sharpshooters. In less than forty days I raised twenty-three hundred men, brought a regiment of infantry, a battery of artillery, and a company of sharpshooters, in all thirteen hundred and sixty men, to this city, and was assigned by General McClellan to Fitz John Porter's division and Martindale's brigade, at Hall's hill. A few weeks after I came I placed my regiment, as I had promised to do, under the command of an accomplished officer of the regular Army, and accepted a position on the staff of General McClellan, where I remained until several weeks after the meeting of Congress, when my duties here required that I should resign that position. Sir, believing that I could render some little service to my struggling country, I gave more than four months to this service, paid my own expenses, expended more than eight hundred dollars, and never received a farthing from the Government, and never shall receive a farthing from the Government. Yes, sir, I gave more than four months of time, at my own expense, expended more than eight hundred dollars, and never received nor ever shall receive one dollar for it. This little contribution of time, of toil, and of money, I cheerfully gave to the cause of my periled country; and the records of my State and of my country show that I have never claimed any compensation for this time, toil, and money. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Order!

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Kentucky, whose hungry ear drinks in so much tattle, brings forth an anonymous letter stating that I offered to appoint a sutler for my regiment, on condition that he would allow me half his profits. Even the Senator from Kentucky expresses his disbelief in the truth of this anonymous letter. A more wholesale slander was never born of malignity and falsehood. No sutler was with my regiment so long as I had the command of it. Before leaving Massachusetts a relative of mine sought to be appointed sutler, and I told him that no relative of mine should have an interest of a dollar in anything connected with my regiment. The appointment of the regimental sutler was made by my successor. No relative or friend of mine ever received, directly or indirectly, a farthing connected with the sutlership or any other thing connected with that or any other regiment. I go further, and say that no human being has received during this rebellion, through any recommendation or influence of mine, directly or indirectly, any job or contract of any Department of the Government of the United States, nor will any human being ever obtain any contract through any solicitation, recommendation, or influence of mine. The Senator drags this anonymous slander into the Senate. Surely such indecency deserves the rebuke of honorable men.

Sir, the Senator assails the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for her action during the war of 1812. It may be that Massachusetts did not do her whole duty in that struggle, but the Senator from Kentucky, who advised that gallant Commonwealth to maintain a position of armed neutrality in this great struggle to preserve the life of the nation, may not reproach her. If any men of Massachusetts hesitated to give their country all of treasure and of life they had to prosecute that war for free trade and sailors' rights, I shall not defend them, whether they be among the living or the dead. I am not here to assail and I never have assailed the State of Kentucky. Never have I uttered a word of censure against the loyal men of that State or of any State, and I never can do so. I have never on this floor, before the people, in the public press, nor in private letters to the dearest friends on earth, spoken or written a line of criticism on any military man conducting operations in the field.

But, sir, I have spoken of rebels, and of rebel sympathizers, and of professed Union men, who, when the blood of Massachusetts men hastening to the defense of the capital reddened the streets of Baltimore, refused to let the troops of Kentucky come to the defense of the capital, and advised that gallant Commonwealth to occupy a position of armed neutrality, that she might dictate terms to the North and to the South when they should become exhausted with the burdens of war. Sir, from the city of Baltimore, while the blood of Massachusetts men smoked on her streets, the Senator advised Kentucky to "look to herself and her own self-preservation;" to "clothe herself in full panoply," and "as the red waves of war from North or South beat against her firm base, let her roll them back with all their desolation," so that "when the contending parties become worn and wasted by a prolonged and bloody war, she can then effectively interfere to command a general peace." From that day to this, with all his professed love for the Union, and all his repeated denunciations of traitors, he has undertaken to play the same rôle; to dictate terms to the Government and to control its policy. He denounces the traitors, he has denounced them to-day, but there is no virtue in his rebukes. He can hardly help denouncing them, for there is nothing on the earth, or above the earth, or in the earth, that the Senator is not swift to carp at, criticise, and denounce. The Senator assumes to dictate to the country; but, thanks be to God, to the instinctive and far-seeing patriotism of the American people, and to the inexorable logic of events, he and his policy are swept away. Even in Kentucky the loyal people are rising in majesty, and will at no distant day banish that class of Union men to which the Senator belongs from that possession of power they love so well. The Senator vauntingly tells us to-day that he knows where to go and who will sustain him. I tell him, and I know whereof I affirm, that Kentucky, gallant and true, is rising with the rest of the country to a realization of the duties imposed upon loyal America. Her sentiments and opinions are not yet heard in the Chamber of the Senate of the United States. Thank God, she has true and noble men who represent her higher and better sentiments in the other wing of the Capitol.

But the Senator from Kentucky reproaches Massachusetts for her legislation intended to protect her own citizens against the inhuman provisions of that infamous fugitive slave law whose provisions so gladden his heart and fill his capacious brain. The Senator mounts his desk and reads to the Senate that infamous enactment that has brought so much shame and dishonor upon our country, in face of the Christian and civilized world. But the enormities of that enactment that have made humanity shudder seem beautiful in the eyes of the Senator from Kentucky. He clings to it, he hugs it the closer because the rest of the world scorn it. He lives and lingers among past recollections, especially if they have the taint and odor of slavery about them. Sir, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in her legislation, never intended forcibly to resist the laws of the United States. No man in her Legislature desired or expected to resist the authority of the Federal Government. What Massachusetts intended to accomplish by her legislation was the protection of her own citizens; and if any questions arose between her and the Federal Government, growing out of the attempted execution of the fugitive slave act, she was ever ready to submit those questions to the judicial tribunals of the country and to abide the verdict. The Senator prates about a little mob, composed of a few men in the city of Boston, and brands their action as insurrection and rebellion. Insurrection! rebellion! Sir, there was no insurrection; there was no rebellion. It was at most but a mob, and a very small mob at that. Their action lingers in the mind of the Senator. He magnifies and gloats over it. He drags it into the Senate Chamber as a reproach to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and to her Senators.

Sir, I say to the Senator from Kentucky that I stand not here to defend any sentiments, opinions, or acts of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, unless those sentiments, opinions, and acts are in harmony with liberty, justice, and humanity. If, in her past history, Massachusetts has failed in her high duties, I am the last man to defend her action here or elsewhere. But I say, and I have a right to say, what that history which shall record these grand events now passing before us will transmit to coming ages for the study and admiration of all after-time, that Massachusetts, for these twenty years, on all the questions that have been forced upon the country by the slaveholding traitors, has occupied a position that will ever command the profound respect and admiration of the Christian and civilized world. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.] And, sir, since the standard of revolt has been raised, her sons have thronged to battle-fields to defend the old flag, maintain the unity of the Republic, and the cherished institutions of freedom. And they will continue to rally around the unrolled banners of the Republic till the waning star of the rebellion sinks down in eternal night. Sir, the representatives of Massachusetts, by word, by vote, and by act, and her armed legions on battle-fields, have maintained, and ever will maintain, the unity of the country and the cherished institutions of this democratic Republic. Sir, the imputations, the reproaches, the slanders that so glibly flow from the lips of the Senator from Kentucky will not reach the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. No word of his can soil her name or dim her fame. There is not strength enough in his arm to fling a shaft that shall reach that proud old Commonwealth.

But, sir, I will follow the Senator no further in his petty criticisms of Massachusetts and his vulgar personalities. I come back to the consideration of the question at issue. After arraigning the administrators of the Government of his country, the Senator from Kentucky, in the resolutions upon your table, declares that the people of the North "ought to revolt" against their "war leaders." Does not the Senator know what the word "revolt" means? Does not the Senator know that "revolt" means to "renounce allegiance," to "rebel"? Does he not know that the word "revolt" means an "insurrection," a "rebellion," a "secession," a "sedition," an "endeavor to overthrow legitimate authority"? If he knows what that word means, he knows that in the connection in which he uses it it means to incite or attempt to incite the people to take the powers of the Government into their own hands. The Senator tells them to revolt and take this great matter into their own hands. What great matter? The conduct of the war—the questions concerning peace and the adjustment of questions growing out of the rebellion. He tells them to revolt, to take the power into their own hands. How are they to revolt, and take the power into their own hands? Why, rush into a national convention and exercise the powers they have taken into their own hands, and terminate the war.

The Senator tries to tell us—although he can hardly utter the word, for it must choke in his throat if he does—that this word "revolt" does not mean dissolving allegiance, does not mean insurrection, but the going into a party convention. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] brought the Senator from Kentucky to the confession that his convention was a revolutionary convention. He admitted on the floor of the Senate that the convention was a revolutionary convention, the exercise of a revolutionary right. What does he say to every man? Revolt; take the power of the Government of the United States; take these matters into your hands; go into a convention to stop this war, and adjust the policy of the Government and the institutions of the country. That means throw away the President, throw away the Cabinet, throw away Congress, throw away the Supreme Court, trample the Constitution and laws of the country under your feet, and go into a national convention and settle these questions for yourselves. A national convention that should attempt to touch these questions, that belong alone to the Government of the United States, would be, must be, a revolutionary tribunal. It would be the first duty of the Government to arrest, try, convict, and execute its members as traitors. The Senator confesses, yes, sir, he confesses in the presence of the Senate, that the convention he asked the people to go into is a revolutionary convention. He knows that if it assumes to act as he tells the people to act it must be a revolutionary convention. This is the meaning and import of the Senator's proposition. He cannot explain it away, he cannot argue it away. He has occupied three long hours to-day in running around it, in climbing over it, in crawling under it; but there stands the proposition, a fixed fact. A proposition so wicked, so revolutionary, so instinct with treason, was never before made in the presence of the Senate of the United States by mortal man. Sir, we have heard Jefferson Davis on this floor expound the theories of Calhoun in words of clearness and precision that often extorted the admiration of enemies; we have heard the treasonable utterances of the pompous Mason; we have listened to the threats of the blustering Toombs, and the bitter words of the malignant Clay. We have heard these men and their compeers expound the false theories of the school of Calhoun, but you will search the Journals of the Senate and the records of the Government in vain to find a proposition so treasonable as this. If anybody doubted before the transcendent wickedness of this proposition, they can doubt no longer after the admission wrong from him to-day by the Senator from Michigan.

Sir, the Senator from Kentucky knows what the word "revolt" means. He knows, too, what the phrase "take that great matter into your own hands" means. He knows what a "national convention" that shall assume to end the war and reconstruct the Government is. No man in America can mistake the obvious meaning and import of the words and phrases. The Senator from Kentucky is not quite so ignorant as we should judge him to be when we listen, as we often do, to his long, discursive, and illogical harangues, that are so often inflicted upon the Senate. In his seventeenth resolution the Senator charges the President with ignoring the constitutions of Tennessee and Arkansas, and others that have not been altered in any particular. When the Senator speaks of Jefferson Davis's insurrection he calls it a "revolt," and a "revolt" of Jeff. Davis is no more a "revolt" than is a "revolt" of Garrett Davis.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I move to lay aside all other business and take up the enrollment bill, that we may leave it as the unfinished business.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me but a minute? I will not detain the Senate for a minute.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will yield the floor for one minute or for five.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know, Mr. President, whether the Senator from Massachusetts' persistence is willful or the result of laws that he cannot control. I was proceeding to define, and I defined at the instance of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] what a revolutionary convention was, and I most distinctly averred again and again that the convention which I would have called was not a revolutionary convention, but was a convention in strict conformity with the Constitution.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now move to lay aside all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the enrollment bill, that that bill may be the unfinished business on the adjournment.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 13, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

UNEMPLOYED GENERAL OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a statement from the Secretary of War showing the number of general officers of the Army unemployed, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DAKOTA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Elections, presented the report in the Dakota contested-election case; which concludes with the following resolution:

B. S. Todd, claiming to be duly elected thereto, to prosecute his contest therefor according to the rules and usages of this House.

The report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GANSON stated that he dissented from the report.

Mr. DAWES also presented depositions in the same case; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

MISSOURI CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. DAWES also presented papers in the contested-election case of the third congressional district of Missouri; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER announced the first business in order to be the call of committees for reports, beginning with the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, joint resolution H. R. No. 18, to amend a joint resolution explanatory of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862.

The joint resolution amends the joint resolution of July 17, 1862, by making it read that no punishment or proceeding under it shall be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the estate of the offender except during his life, the amendment being intended to limit the operation and effect of the law only so far as to make them conformable to section three, article three, of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed informally to offer the following amendment:

Provided, That no other public warning or proclamation under the act of July 17, 1862, chapter ninety-five, section six, is or shall be required than the proclamation of the President, made and published by him on 25th July, 1862; which proclamation so made shall be received and held sufficient in all cases now pending or which may hereafter arise under said act.

Mr. WILSON. I demand the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. LONG demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. PENDLETON moved that the bill and amendment be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER decided the motion to be out of order, the previous question having been seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOLMAN, and COLE, of California, were appointed.

The yeas and nays were ordered; the tellers having reported that forty, more than one fifth, had voted in the affirmative.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atley, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brundage, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Eckley, Eliot, Fenton, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Longyear, Lovejoy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upton, Van Valkenburg, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—78.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Griswold, Hall, Holman, Kalbfleisch, Kernau, King, Knapp, Law, Lazarus, Le Blond, Long, Murcy, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Sweet, Voorhees, Wheeler, Clifton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—54.

So the amendment was adopted.

During the vote, Mr. COLE, of Washington, stated that Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland, was detained from the House by illness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, the law affected by the joint resolution just reported from the Committee on the Judiciary is in the following language:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the provisions of the third clause of the fifth section of 'An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes,' shall be so construed as not to apply to any act or acts done prior to the passage thereof; nor to include any member of a State Legislature, or judge of any State court, who has not, in accepting or entering upon his office, taken an oath to support the constitution of the so-called Confederate States of America; nor shall any punishment or proceedings under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life."

The only part of that resolution affected by the one now under consideration is the last clause, which provides that no punishment or proceeding under the confiscation act shall be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life. The object of the resolution which I have reported is to amend that last clause of the resolution of July, 1862, as to make it conform to section third of article third of the Constitution of the United States. In other words, it proposes to substitute for the language embraced in that resolution of 1862 the language of the Constitution, which is as follows:

"The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained."

We do not propose by the resolution to determine the question of the legislative construction of the Constitution, whether we may provide for forfeiture of fee or confiscation of the real estate during life. The pending resolution leaves the whole matter to the court. In other words, we simply submit the section of the Constitution relating to the forfeiture of real estate to the courts of the country to determine whether forfeiture may be in fee or only for life.

Mr. COX. I ask my friend from Iowa whether he intends to press the resolution to a vote now, without time for preparation or for debate?

Mr. WILSON. I propose to permit discussion to go on during the morning hour.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman propose to call for the previous question, so as to cut off debate on this side of the House?

Mr. WILSON. I desire to have action on the resolution.

Mr. COX. The gentleman cannot have action this morning.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. By what authority does the gentleman from Ohio make that declaration?

Mr. COX. By authority of the rules of the House, which can be made to prevent such hasty legislation as will strike at the very organic law of the country.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We will see.

Mr. KERNAN. Let me state the reasons why I dissent from the report of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON. I agree to yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I was unable to agree with the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary as to the working of this amendment to the joint resolution explanatory of the confiscation act; and I desire to state briefly my reasons. I wish to call the attention of the House, in the first place, to the circumstances under which the confiscation act was passed, as they may not be fresh in the recollection of all.

Now, sir, the confiscation act was passed by Congress and sent to the President, and before the joint resolution now proposed to be amended was passed, the President prepared a message to veto the original confiscation act, and I beg to read from that message which the President transmitted to the House as his views in reference to the confiscation act. I read from the Congressional Globe:

"That which I chiefly object pervades most part of the act, but more distinctly appears in the first, second, seventh, and eighth sections. It is the sum of those provisions which results in the divesting of title forever.

"For the causes of treason and ingredients of treason, not amounting to the full crime, it declares forfeiture extending beyond the lives of the guilty parties; whereas the Constitution of the United States declares that 'no attainder shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained.' True, there is to be no formal attainder in this case: still I think the greater punishment cannot be constitutionally inflicted, in a different form, for the same offense.

"I may remark that the provision of the Constitution, put in language borrowed from Great Britain, applies only in this country, as I understand, to real or landed estate."

After the President, having this confiscation act under consideration, had, as he says to Congress, prepared this message to veto it, because it was unconstitutional, as purporting to take away, as part punishment of treason, a greater estate in lands than a life estate, Congress passed the resolution explanatory of the confiscation act, and sent it to the President; and the language of the explanatory resolution now in question I beg leave to read again:

"Nor shall any punishment or proceeding under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life."

After Congress had passed and the President had approved that act and the explanatory resolution, he returned them to Congress, using this language in his message returning them with his approval:

"Considering the bill for 'An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes,' and the joint resolution explanatory of said act as being substantially one, I have approved and signed both."

So that we have from the President a statement, first, that any attempt by Congress or by the law-making power, to make as a part punishment of treason the forfeiture of a greater estate in lands than a life estate of the offender, would be unconstitutional; and secondly, that he only approved the act because he regarded the joint resolution, now proposed to be changed, a part of the act. And as the law now stands, there is no doubt that the forfeiture incurred as to the real estate of the traitor is only of his life estate. Believing as I do that that is as far as we can affect real estate as a part punishment of treason, I deem it wise to allow the law to stand. I agree with the President that the true construction of the Constitution is that we have not power to cut off the inheritance of innocent heirs as part punishment for treason.

But it is said by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee that he only proposes to amend by substituting the language of the Constitution, which I suppose is claimed to be different in construction from that now contained in the resolution. Now, I submit to the House, and I submit it with great earnestness, but with great deference, whether it is wise to change the law as it stands. It has been said, it was urged upon us in committee, or at least it was suggested, that one judge had held that the language of the Constitution could be so construed as to forfeit the real estate forever of the guilty traitor. But I submit to the House that it is at least a very doubtful question whether the language of the Constitution can be fairly so construed. The language of the Constitution is, "but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attained." I agree with the President that by this language the Constitution restrains us from forfeiting the land forever. It seems to me this is entirely clear; but if the question is a doubtful one, I submit to the gentleman whether it is ever wise to make our laws so that there may be a grave doubt whether they are constitutional or not. Is it wise, particularly upon a subject like this, where the judgment of the court below is to be in reference to the title of real estate, to put the law in such a shape that it will be doubtful in its meaning, one judge construing it in one way and another judge in another way?

Let it be remembered that the court which is first to pass upon this law, which is to condemn the property and order it to be sold—and under its judgment it must be sold—is an inferior court, constituted by a single judge. If he holds, upon this equivocal question, made equivocal by Congress itself by the proposed amendment, that the fee passes, the party purchasing so believes. But there will be a right of review, and in testing that question years hence by heirs in the court above, the court may certainly hold that only a life estate can be condemned and sold, and thereby the purchaser will be involved in the misfortune of losing what he paid.

If, on the contrary, the court below should hold that only a life estate can be condemned and sold, it will sell for only a small sum. If on review there should be a judgment the other way the purchaser makes a great speculation out of the Government by getting the whole fee, when he only bid and paid for a life estate. I submit whether it is wise for the law-making power to make an amendment for the purpose of making the act, now clear, doubtful.

Again—and I ask the attention of every fair man to decide this for himself—if we had the constitutional power to take away forever the estate in land, would it be wise to do so? I submit that the punishment for treason, like the punishment for every other crime, should fall upon the guilty party only, and that we should not seek to affect his innocent children and heirs. Take away from the guilty party his life estate, his right to dispose of it, but do not take away the right of inheritance from the innocent heirs, who will show themselves loyal, else they never will have the right to come in court and ask to be heard.

I submit again, if there is a desire to press this matter through now, that this law and joint resolution are and speak as one law as they stand; that the law could not have been passed but from the fact that the joint resolution was made a part of it. The act was amended in accordance with the President's suggestion of what it ought to be. Now, repeal the joint resolution, or so amend it that it speaks anew from this time, and how will it affect men who have been guilty of treason since July, 1862, when the law was enacted? At least it will raise very embarrassing questions in reference to proceedings now pending, because the rule is that if you repeal a penal law all proceedings under it, not completed before the repeal, fall.

But, sir, allow me to make another suggestion, and I do it with a desire as earnest as man can entertain that we should act wisely for the restoration of this Union and the upholding of this Government. I am in favor of energetically wielding the powers of the Government to overthrow and put down organized rebellion and armed rebels; and yet, sir, I do believe that if we love our country, if we hope to see our people ever again living peacefully under a united Government, we should toward the masses of the people in the rebellious States hold out every inducement which the Government honorably can hold out to induce them to desert the secession leaders, to lay down their arms, and come back to their allegiance to the Constitution and the laws; and it seems to me that one great inducement would be that the Government had not taken away from the masses of the people the right of their children to inherit their lands, or their own right, if they lay down their arms and comply with such amnesty as the Government may deem it wise to offer, to buy back cheaply the life-estate which they have lost. If we forfeit the lands of the masses of the people forever, if we make the law such that the courts hold that the lands are sold to purchasers forever, do we not put the Government in a position where they cannot hold out, not to the leading instigators and actors in the rebellion, but to the great masses of the people of the South, the inducement which I think it would be wise to hold out to them to induce them to desert those leaders and to come back to the old Government, under which we must hope at least to bring the great mass of them; because no man, I take it, desires to exterminate the great mass of that people? Sir, let me suggest again that if we attempt to sell these lands in fee, if we leave the law in such shape that the courts will be enabled so to construe it—though I do not think they rightfully can, or that they ultimately will—you will have the rights of purchasers intervening to embarrass the Federal Government in any scheme of amnesty which they may think wise and proper to hold forth to the masses of the people of the South for the purpose of establishing proper relations between them and the Government under the Constitution; to embarrass the Government in its efforts to restore its civil authority after we have overthrown the armed rebels and brought to punishment the leaders who have instigated and acted in this attack on the authority of the Government.

I trust for these reasons, which I have not attempted to argue, but merely to state briefly, the House will not pass this resolution, or at least they will allow us to have it printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so that gentlemen may examine it carefully, for believe me we are all deeply interested, both for the present and for the future, in acting wisely and prudently in reference to this matter.

If it is in order, and if the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary will permit me, I will move or will ask him to move that the resolution be printed and postponed to some future day for consideration, or that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where there will be no disposition to oppose or discuss it factiously, but where gentlemen will have the means of looking into the matter and of deciding whether it is wise to change the law, which now inflicts as a part of the punishment for treason forfeiture of estate for life. I believe that is all that we can constitutionally do, and therefore I am not in favor of amending the law as it now stands, which is clear, so as to leave it doubtful and open to legal construction.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that there are some other members of the Committee on the Judiciary who desire to be heard upon this proposition, and I certainly have no desire to press it unreasonably upon the House. I will therefore move to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary. That will admit of general discussion on the resolution. Let the discussion proceed during the present morning hour, and then let it pass over as unfinished business to be taken up in future. That will enable gentlemen to examine the resolution, and also to express such views as they may desire to present to the House. I submit the motion to recommit, and I also move that the joint resolution be printed.

The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I have drawn an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the resolution, which I propose to offer whenever it shall be in order under the rules. I ask that it be read and printed.

Mr. STEVENS's proposed amendment was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the joint resolution passed July 17, 1863, and the joint resolution explanatory of an act to suppress rebellion, be, and the same are hereby, approved.

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, treason is the highest crime known to law, whether considered in its moral or its social aspect. The man who willingly betrays his country or conspires its destruction is justly regarded, and ever has been, as guilty of a turpitude, a baseness, and a moral obliquity without a parallel in the history of human depravity or in the calendar of crime. The violator of private friendship is regarded as a perfidious man, and justly stamped with the mark of opprobrium, while he who strives to break up the foundations of society, to overturn the established institutions of his country, to rupture every tie held dear by man, has in all ages been regarded as an enemy of his race, whose extirpation is demanded by every sentiment of humanity, by every instinct of self-preservation, and by the inexorable logic of social existence. Morally, the traitor in his mad career breaks every bond of a well-regulated restraint and opens upon community the floodgates of vice, dishonesty, fraud, violence, and injustice. He diffuses a malaria into the moral atmosphere, and defies the laws of God with the same ruthlessness with which he endeavors to abrogate the laws of man. In his presence virtue stands abashed, and vice in all its hideous deformity rules the hours. His object is to destroy the foundations of society, and with these every vestige of whatever is of good report. Feeling his own abasement, his aim is to drag to his level all who by the practice of honorable virtues and upright walk and conversation have incurred his envy and his malice. Politically, he is endeavoring to rend the ligaments of social existence which men have formed for their mutual benefit and protection, to upturn the civil institutions of the land ordained for the guardianship and safety of life, of person, and of property, and to destroy that Government which has preserved him, his property, and his family, and extended its blessings to all within the folds of its jurisdiction. He is seeking to destroy the avenues of trade and commerce, to obstruct the due administration of justice, to close the shop of the artisan and stop the farmer in the cultivation of the soil, to light the torch of civil war and rebellion, to array brother against brother in bloody hostility, and fill the land with widows, with orphans, with bankruptcy, with poverty, and universal desolation and destruction.

Men so base and so wicked have, in all ages and in all countries, been held and treated as public enemies, and the highest punishment inflicted upon them. The law of self-defense, applicable as well to nations as to individuals, requires that the offender who thus strikes at the existence of the nation should be removed from society by the infliction of the death penalty, or subjected to such other punishments by way of example as may be necessary to vindicate national dignity and deter others from the commission of the same offense. "The traitor shall die" is plainly written upon the statute-book of every civilized or semi-civilized nation of modern or ancient times; and the question of proper punishment to traitors now forces itself upon the American legislator in view of that terrible rebellion which is at this time convulsing our land and filling it with blood.

In the proper discharge of this duty it becomes us to look into the judicial history of that country whence we have drawn our system of laws; to examine the law of treason; to observe its changes and the reason thereof; to examine the philosophy of punishments denounced from time to time against the traitor; and deduce therefrom the law of treason in our own country, and the power to punish conferred upon Congress by the Constitution.

The law of treason in England was first definitely enacted and authoritatively settled by act of Parliament in the reign of King Edward III, commonly known as the statute of 25 Edward III. The immediate origin of this statute was in the fact that prior thereto

"The king's justices in different counties adjudged men indicted before them to be traitors for divers matters not known by the Commons to be treasonable."—Hallam, 3, p. 204.

By this statute the subject was for the first time informed of the acts which should thereafter constitute the crime of treason, and he was no longer at the mercy of imbecile or corrupt judges, who could by arbitrary construction decide each case of alleged treason by the particular circumstances attending it; for it has been well said that

"No people can enjoy a free constitution unless an adequate security is furnished by their laws against the discretion of their judges."

The punishment of traitors at common law, so far as related to the person, we are informed by Blackstone, was—

1. That the offender be drawn to the gallows, and not be carried or walk.
2. That he be hanged by the neck and then cut down alive.
3. That his entrails be taken out and burned while he is yet alive.
4. That his head be cut off.
5. That his body be divided into four parts.
6. That his head and quarters be at the king's disposal.

This punishment to us seems like a refinement of cruelty to the culprit, but serves to show the detestation with which the crime was viewed in that early age of the British constitution by those who felt and appreciated good order in society, and were determined to punish those who sought its destruction.

But the common law did not stop here in its punishment. The conviction of the traitor was followed by attainder.

Attainder was the immediate and inseparable consequence of a sentence of death. Being pronounced a monster and a bane to human society, he became attaint, "stained," or "blackened." He lost his civil rights, had no credit or reputation, could not be a witness, was, in fact, regarded as already dead in law.

The legal consequences of attainder, the incidents attached thereto and inseparable therefrom, were corruption of blood and forfeiture of estate.

A person attainted could not inherit lands from his ancestor, nor transmit them to his posterity, and hence, as in the failure of issue to take the inheritance, it reverted or escheated to the lord of the fee. This doctrine was in deference to the behests (if I may use the expression) of the feudal system. By that grand military system, so long and so extensively prevalent in England and on the Continent, the land was claimed in fee by the superior lord, and by him granted to favorites on the condition principally of rendering military service and promising fealty, faith, loyalty to the lord from whom the fief was holden. As a natural and necessary consequence, when the tenant became unfaithful, or rebelled against the lord, and thus was found guilty of treason, the tenure by which he held his possession was violated, the condition was broken, and the land escheated to the lord, to be again granted to some one who should be a more faithful and obedient follower.

In process of time, however, as feudal tenures passed away, giving place to more liberal and enlightened notions of government, and assuring to the people at large a recognition of their manhood and of their rights, the doctrine of the corruption of blood upon attainder became modified, and in the reigns of Elizabeth and William III the Parliament enacted statutes limiting and confining it to the higher grades of crime. And at a later period, several years after the adoption of our own Constitution, by the statute of 54 George III, corruption of blood was abolished in all cases except murder and high treason.

Forfeiture of estate was the other incident following the judgment of attainder, and this incident of attainder still continues to be the law in England. It is founded, we are told by Blackstone,

"Upon the consideration that he who hath violated the fundamental principles of government and broken his part of the original contract between king and people, hath abandoned his connections with society, and hath no longer any right to those advantages which before belonged to him purely as a member of the community; among which social advantages the right of transferring and transmitting property to others is one of the chief."

The reason upon which this doctrine of forfeiture is founded is one which produces conviction to every mind. Men enter into a state of society for mutual benefit and protection. The right to own, transfer, and transmit property is not a natural but a social right. It is conferred upon the individual by the rules and regulations of society, made and altered from time to time as exigency may require. In a state of nature I can use the horse so long as he remains in my actual possession, and I can only retain such possession by the arm of force against the intruder who desires to wrest him from me. In a state of society my right to the horse is recognized and enforced by the laws of the land, and my right to use, possess, transfer, or transmit him is guaranteed by the same laws, which will come to my relief whenever my right is invaded or threatened by another. So with the right to all property. I do not mean the mere right of temporary possession, but the absolute right as against all the world. It is wholly created, regulated, and preserved by the laws of society.

In return for the enjoyment and protection of these rights, I owe corresponding duties to society, the highest of which is allegiance, fealty, loyalty. Whenever I become derelict in my duty as a member of society, and especially when I endeavor to break its very bonds and upturn the foundations on which it rests, I violate my implied compact as a member, and forfeit all claim to the rights which it has conferred upon and guaranteed to me. Not only my life but every vestige of my property is at the disposal of that government which I intended to destroy, and that government owes it to itself, to the loyal members thereof, in punishment of my crime, to remove me by the death penalty, and to take from me that property which was only mine because the government had so decreed on condition of my loyalty.

This doctrine of forfeiture is not the creature of the feudal system. It existed long prior thereto, and is traced by lawyers to the usages and customs of the Scandinavians. I doubt not it existed and was exercised in the very earliest attempts of man to establish systems of civil government, because it is founded upon principles of reason and of natural justice. It was recognized and enforced in the very infancy of English jurisprudence, and although it has in the mutations of time and the advancing progress of the science of law undergone many changes and modifications, yet the principle remains to-day an essential part and element of criminal jurisprudence in every enlightened and civilized nation.

In England, at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, real estate was forfeited upon attainder while personal estate was forfeited by conviction. The forfeiture of lands had relation back to the time the act causing the forfeiture was committed, and the offender could not alienate or incur the same to the prejudice of the king, while in reference to personal property the offender could, at any time prior to conviction, sell or otherwise dispose of the same.

Bills of attainder are likewise known to British history. They are such special acts of the legislature as inflict capital punishment upon persons supposed to be guilty of high offenses, such as treason and felony, without any conviction in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. (3 Story on Constitution, p. 209.) And the most eminent of English lawyers have held that so transcendent and unlimited are the legislative powers of the British Parliament that they had the power to attain a man after his death, and this power was frequently exercised by Parliament. The history of England, especially during the stormy times of rebellion, or when the Parliament was but the reflex of the whims and caprices of some petty malignant tyrant who for the time being occupied the throne, is full of these revolting spectacles where the supposed offender, after he had gone to his last account, was exhumed, as it were, from his grave, and by the omnipotent fiat of Parliament declared guilty of crimes with which he was not confronted or even accused during life. The stain was placed upon his memory, the blood was corrupted, and his innocent posterity robbed of that inheritance which by the laws of the realm had descended to and vested in them as the lawful descendants of their ancestor. A doctrine so monstrous in its iniquity, so revolting to every sense of right and justice, could, of course, find no toleration among a people who loved a free government, and hence we find among the prominent clauses of our Constitution that which declares, "No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

With this brief and to me (for want of sufficient time) unsatisfactory sketch of the prominent features of the law of treason in Great Britain, whence we derive the bulk of our civil jurisprudence, we come now to examine the law-making power of Congress over the subject, and the penalties which it is authorized to prescribe for the punishment of treason. The framers of the Constitution were fully cognizant of the early history of England in this respect, and, desiring to avoid the difficulties and dangers resulting from vague, indefinite, and frequently corrupt and designing constructions of what acts should constitute this great crime, wisely declared that

"Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

On this subject, the definition of the crime of treason, which so long perplexed the people and the statesmen of England, we have no difficulty or trouble. The organic law of the land has declared to every citizen what acts he may commit with impunity and what acts, if committed, will call down upon his guilty head the severe penalty for his crime.

The same section of the Constitution, article three, section three, which defines the crime of treason, provides that

"The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason; but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained."

Here the power is expressly given to Congress to punish the crime of treason; but I presume no lawyer would doubt for a moment, in the absence of this constitutional provision, that Congress, as the law-making branch of the nation, possessed this power of providing punishment without any express grant of the power.

Some object or purpose was then intended by the framers for thus inserting this part of the section, and that object unquestionably was, not to circumscribe the authority of Congress in providing punishment, but to limit and restrict the consequences of attainder which, at common law, followed the sentence of death or outlawry. Our fathers were jealous of political rights and privileges; they recognized to its fullest extent the doctrine of conferring upon the citizen the largest liberty compatible with the safety of society; they had but recently severed their connections with the mother country, and, in the organization of a Government for themselves and their posterity, their principal aim was to secure the rights of the individual against the tyranny of the sovereign and the caprices or corruptions of the legislature. Viewed in this light, and it is the light of reason, of history, of experience, the adoption of that section by the Convention is most natural. Not that they supposed for a single moment that without it Congress would not possess the power of providing punishment for this crime, but while expressly granting to Congress this power they at the same time limited the common-law effect of a judgment of attainder, and surrounded it by restrictions which they considered necessary for the safety of the citizen, and to secure him from the infliction of those barbarous and inhuman punishments which had characterized and for ages disgraced the criminal history of England.

The whole question, then, of the extent of our power to provide a punishment for treason which in our judgment shall be adequate to the suppression of the crime, rests upon the construction to be given to the limitation in the clause referred to. The words of limitation are, "but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained."

This language has as yet in our history received no authoritative judicial construction; and hence we can adopt for our guidance the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, p. 209:

"As men whose intentions require no concealment generally employ the words which most directly and apply express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlightened patriots who framed our Constitution, and the people who adopted it, must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they said."

To ascertain the true intent of the framers, the student naturally turns in the first instance to their recorded views at the time of their action, if such be accessible, in order to throw light upon subjects of doubtful construction, or about the true meaning of which men may honestly differ in opinion. In examining, however, Eliot's Debates of the Convention, we find nothing to aid us in the solution, and the same may be said of Madison's Papers. Either the matter was not the subject of debate, or, if so, it was regarded as not of sufficient importance to merit permanent preservation.

To prosecute further inquiry we consult contemporaneous exposition and the views of commentators whose learning, research, and ability command attention. Those able political essays, published during the time of the adoption of the Constitution by the several States, and denominated "the Federalist," although full of political wisdom and a true knowledge of the science of government, fail to throw any light whatever upon this subject. However desirable it would have been to the student of constitutional history to have had the aid and assistance of those who were, doubtless, familiar with the views of the members of the Convention, yet these are now vain regrets, and we are left unaided by contemporaneous exposition to investigate and conclude each one for himself.

Does Congress, then, under the Constitution, possess the power to punish treason by the absolute forfeiture of the property of the traitor? After a careful review of the question, with an examination of such authorities and discussions as were within my reach, I have no hesitation in answering the question in the affirmative. Whether I shall be able to convince any one but myself of the truth of my position may probably be my fault.

Rawle, in his able treatise on the Constitution, in commenting upon the third section of the third article, says:

"In respect to the forfeiture, the meaning seems"—

Mark the word "seems"— "to be that Congress shall not impose a forfeiture beyond the term of the offender's life, but it may be abolished altogether; and in this sense it has been understood and acted on in the laws;"

referring to the act for the punishment of treason passed in the year 1790.

He disposes of the question in half a dozen lines, but the language employed by him, and the exceeding short space in his treatise devoted to the subject, justify us in arriving at two conclusions: firstly, that the question did not then attract general attention or call for any special investigation, and at that time more practical and pressing portions of our political system only were reviewed; secondly, that even in the cursory mode in which he mentions the matter, he does it with a doubt upon his mind, saying that "the meaning seems to be," &c. No one need be at a loss as to the weight to be attached to an authority coming to us as this does, however learned and able the author may be in other respects.

Story, volume three, page 172, comments upon the terms "corruption of blood" and "forfeiture of estate" jointly, and in the same connection; and after dwelling at some length upon the severity of such punishments and the gross injustice it inflicts upon innocent offspring by corruption of blood, remarks that—

"Upon these and similar grounds it may be presumed that the clause was first introduced into the original draft of the Constitution; and, after some amendments, it was adopted without any apparent resistance."

Curtis, the most recent as well as one of the most able commentators, volume two, page 387, merely states that

"The punishment of treason was left to Congress, with the limitation, however, that no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture," &c.

These are the views, they can hardly be denominated authoritative views, of our writers on constitutional law; and I submit that, being all somewhat cursory in their character, and exceedingly limited in their discussion of the question, they cannot be regarded with much weight, at least not sufficiently so as to deter further examination.

The first law on this subject passed by Congress was in 1790, and after declaring the punishment of death against the traitor, provides, "no conviction or judgment shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture of estate." No argument against my position can be legitimately drawn from this act of Congress. It was passed in the very infancy of our Government, when purity and patriotism were the ruling virtues of official and private life; when love of country and enthusiastic devotion to our institutions were pure and unalloyed, and men vied with each other only to perfect, to strengthen, to perpetuate the Government which had cost so much of sacrifice, of suffering, of endurance. Congress was satisfied at that time with the declaration of the death penalty without resort to fines or forfeitures as an additional punishment, and in doing so merely refrained from exercising to its full extent the power of punishment which the Constitution has conferred.

The language of this section, we must remember, is, "but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained." If the Constitution had intended to prohibit corruption of blood or forfeiture altogether, why add the words "except during the life of the person attained?" Had these latter words been omitted the restriction would have been absolute, and Congress could not, by any punishment whatever, have deprived the person attained of any property for even a single day or hour. But these words, "except during the life of the person attained," are part of the Constitution; and shall we be driven, in their construction, to the absurd position that such forfeiture shall only extend to the lifetime of the traitor and then cease? Did our Constitution, else so redolent with wisdom and statesmanship, intend to provide for such a farce as that the property of the traitor should be forfeited to the Government only for that brief space of time which should intervene between the day of sentence and the day of execution? Is it rational or logical to suppose that such a construction of this section, where the forfeiture at best would probably be from thirty to ninety or one hundred and twenty days, could in any just sense of the term be called a punishment? Can it be supposed that the Constitution intended to regard the high and damning crime of treason with more lenity than the criminal code regards the comparatively insignificant crime of horse-stealing or petit larceny? In the latter case, by the common consent of all mankind you inflict imprisonment, fine, and forfeiture, and affix thereby a brand of infamy upon the culprit which, like the mark of Cain, is forever upon his brow; while the traitor, guilty of every crime known to the decalogue, and more too, remains undisturbed in his possessions. He who commits a single murder forfeits his life to the commonwealth, and such of his property, by way of fine, as the judgment may impose; and yet he who by his treason commits a thousand murders shall be exempt from any practical forfeiture.

If you cannot by forfeiture deprive the traitor of his property, how can you collect any fine which may be assessed against him? Forfeiture is a method of alienating property, and by the act of the last Congress you authorized a fine to be assessed against the traitor of not less than $10,000. This fine becomes a judgment of court, and a lien upon the real estate of the culprit, and the same judgment also denounces the sentence of death. A warrant issues to the officer to carry into effect the sentence of death, and a writ of fiat facias to collect the fine by seizure and sale of the real and personal estate. Both writs are in process of execution at the same time. With the one the officer makes a levy on the real and personal estate and gives notice of the day of sale; by virtue of the other he purchases a rope and erects a scaffold. The defendant is to be hung in thirty days after sentence, but the sale cannot be had without giving, say forty days' notice of the time and place. The traitor is hung, life becomes extinct, the attending physician pronounces him dead; and the opposite construction of the Constitution pronounces the writ of fieri facias also defunct and the forfeiture a nullity. For, they say, you can only forfeit, take, alienate the estate for the period of his life, and if you proceed to sell property by virtue of the fieri facias, you sell, alienate, convey the fee simple thereof, and to do this would be, in the opposite view, a violation of the Constitution.

Absurd and ridiculous as such a conclusion is, it is the legitimate result of a contrary construction of this section of the Constitution.

What, then, is the fair import of these words, "except during the life of the person attainted?" To my mind they will admit of but a single rational interpretation, and that is that there shall be no forfeiture after the death of the person attainted. In other words, the judgment of the court shall be rendered against him while he is alive, after he has had a fair trial, with opportunity to confront his accusers, meet them face to face, and combat their accusations. That after his death, whether according to the course of nature or by process of law, no judgment or sentence shall be had the effect of which shall be to forfeit his estate, unless that judgment shall be final and irrevocable prior to his death. If I were disposed to indulge in mere verbal criticism I might animadvert upon the word "except" used in that section. The science of philology is progressive, and the same words, in different ages and times, may be used to mean dissimilar things, or designate dissimilar objects. Change is a law of nature irrevocably stamped upon everything, animate or inanimate, and pertains to every department of human knowledge. The word "except," we are told by lexicographers, is equivalent to the word "unless," and a century ago, as reference to the writers of that age will show, was used almost exclusively in the same sense as we now use the word "unless." Numerous instances of this are found in the Holy Bible, where the word "except" is used in sentences in which at the present day we should invariably use the word "unless;" thus:

"Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it."

"Except the Lord of Hosts had left unto us a very small remnant we should have been as Sodom."

"Can two walk together, except they be agreed?"

"Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

"Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

In all these instances, and they could be multiplied almost ad infinitum from writings of that age, both sacred and profane, the word "except" is used in the sense in which we of the present day would use the equivalent word "unless."

Now, then, let us, in further illustration of my position, substitute the word "unless" for the word "except" in the clause under consideration. It will then read:

"But no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, unless during the life of the person attainted."

Unless what or when? The attainder shall not work forfeiture unless it be worked, completed, during the lifetime. If the prisoner die after verdict of guilty and before judgment, there can be no forfeiture. If the prisoner die after sentence of death and before judgment of forfeiture, there can be no forfeiture. If the prisoner be executed after sentence of death and before judgment of forfeiture is entered, there can be no forfeiture. The sentence of death and the judgment of forfeiture are not necessarily simultaneous acts. They may be rendered separately, on separate days, if you please, and the right is thus reserved to the prisoner to move in arrest of the judgment of forfeiture even after sentence of death is passed upon him; for the criminal law holds the rights of the prisoner in such regard that it will take no step against him in any of the stages of trial, from arrest to final execution, without giving him an opportunity of being heard in his defense.

In further support of my position, let me advert to the fact that in England, long prior to and at the adoption of our Constitution, attainder of treason after the death of the supposed traitor (I mean his natural death before trial or even accusation) was of frequent occurrence. This was a monstrous doctrine, shocking to every principle of justice upon which the criminal code is founded, to accuse a man of crime after death, when none is to speak for his innocence, to proceed to trial and judgment, to wrest from innocent hands that property which by law upon his death descended to and vested in his heirs, and forfeit their property, not his property, to the Government for his supposed criminal conduct. Is it not more just and reasonable to suppose that the Constitution intended to embrace and provide against this monstrous perversion of natural justice than that they intended so absurd a proposition as that the forfeiture of estate should only be for that brief period of time between sentence of death and its execution?

The Constitution, in conferring upon Congress the "power to declare the punishment of treason," when the civilized world at that time punished treason by death, certainly meant to confer upon Congress the power to declare the death penalty as part of the punishment. Congress exercised this power at a very early period in our history by declaring the death penalty, and no man has ever doubted the power of Congress in this respect. Can it then be inferred that the Constitution had a more tender regard for the property of a traitor than for his life? And yet such would be the result if a contrary doctrine prevailed.

So much for the legal view of the question, the right of Congress to provide for the absolute forfeiture of the traitor's property, as was done by the act of Congress of July 17, 1862. That act was however restricted (in deference to the opinion then entertained by many persons both in and out of Congress) by an explanatory joint resolution passed on the same day.

The object of the bill now under consideration, just reported from the Judiciary Committee, is to "explain" said explanatory resolution, and leave the law stand as it does by the act of last session. I am in favor of doing this, but I prefer doing it directly, as provided by the amendment I have offered to the bill of the committee, by a simple repeal of the explanatory resolution.

I ask the attention of the House for a few moments to some observations as to the propriety of a law making forfeiture absolute. We are told that taking the property of the traitor and placing its proceeds in the national Treasury, is a robbery of his innocent offspring, and a visiting of the sins of the father upon his children. Even if this were so, it would be but a just fulfillment of the scriptural denunciation against the wicked; for we are told that the sins of the father (and I am inclined to think that this includes treason) are visited upon the children even unto the third and fourth generation.

But I deny the proposition. You cannot take from one that which he hath not. You cannot rob one who is not possessed of anything. I propose to take from the traitor his property before his death, and before it can descend to and vest in his heirs. The child has no natural right to the property of the father. Even in society the child cannot demand as a social right the possession of his father's estate. The father, during his lifetime, can alienate his property by deed of conveyance or by will to take effect at his death, and he can by either process totally disinherit his children, and grant his estate to strangers. It is only in a certain contingency that the child obtains possession of the father's property, as where he dies intestate, and this right of inheritance is purely a social right, depending upon express legislation or immemorial usage ripened into the validity and sanctity of express law. Society has the right without crime to take to itself the property of any of its members upon his death, and hence we have what is denominated "collateral inheritance tax," by which in many States the sovereign on failure of direct issue takes to himself a certain portion of the inheritance. The right of a State to take from the collateral heir implies the equal right to take from the direct heir, and if it can take a part, it can, upon the same principle, take the whole. If the State can do so in the absence of crime, there is the greater reason why it can do so for the punishment of crime, and especially so where that crime is one that strikes at the very existence of social institutions which alone have protected the individual in the acquisition and enjoyment of that property.

While I should oppose the enactment of laws which would inflict cruel, harsh, or unjust punishment upon offenders, yet we must not lose sight of the object of penal statutes. Society owes it to itself to inflict such punishment as is adequate to the enormity of the offense, and at the same time serve as a wholesome terror to evil-doers; and it is equally the duty of society to enact, modify, or change their penal code as the exigency of the occasion may demand.

We are in the midst of a terrible rebellion. From the sturdy blows of organized treason this nation is to-day reeling and staggering like a drunken man. The times demand of patriotism the exercise of every virtue, of every duty, in crushing this rebellion and punishing its guilty authors. While the soldier has left his home and the comforts and endearments of his hearthstone to confront the armed traitor on the field of battle, while he is enduring all the privations of a soldier's life, undergoing the fatigues of a soldier's duties, to preserve the Constitution of the country and its liberties and its blessings, our duty in these halls is to strengthen the arm of that patriotic soldier, to cheer, to succor, to aid and encourage him, and by the exercise of every constitutional power assist in dethroning treason and to mete out proper punishment to traitors.

BUSINESS ON SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the House do now proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The joint resolution (S. No. 15) amendatory of the joint resolution to supply in part deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for bounties to volunteers, was taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

PENNSYLVANIA WAR EXPENSES.

Mr. GANSON, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas a bill entitled "A bill to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania for expenses in calling out the militia of said State during the recent invasion" is now pending before this House, and there is nothing accompanying the said bill showing the character of the said expenses; and whereas the said expenses have been audited by the Second Auditor: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Second Auditor be, and he is hereby, required to report to this House what the character of such expenses is, whether the militia referred to in the said bill was called out by the Governor of Pennsylvania, whether they were mustered into the service of the United States, and under authority of what law the said expenses were audited by him.

ARMY RETURNS.

Mr. ARNOLD asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House with a statement of the number of men called into the military service of the United States since March, 1861; the quota of each State under each call; the number furnished and also the number tendered under each call; the length of time for which they were accepted; what State or States furnished an excess over its quota; also what State or States did not furnish its quota, and the number deficient.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for information, the resolution will lie over, under the rules, for one day, unless there be unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS. I must ask that the resolution do lie over. I beg leave to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois whether the information called for is not of altogether too extensive a character.

Mr. ARNOLD. We want the information called for in order to enable us to act on the enrollment bill. I have no objection to the resolution lying over for a day.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask that it be laid over.

The resolution was, under the rule, laid over.

PROVOST MARSHALS.

Mr. COFFROTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend the act commonly known as the conscription act, to compel the provost marshals to hold their examinations in each county town of the district; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move that the rules be suspended, so that the bill may be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is only in order on Mondays.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. A. MYERS, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to inquire into and report upon the expediency of so amending the act enrolling and calling out the national forces, &c., as to make the term of service of drafted persons one year, and leaving the commutation clause as it is, but appropriating the money arising therefrom in part for the procurement of substitutes, and in part to pay bounties to drafted men, or to the families of such as enter the service.

PENNSYLVANIA WAR EXPENSES—AGAIN.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, in accordance with the Digest, the first business in order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union will be the unfinished business of yesterday—the bill to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania—but it will lose its place as a special order, it having been only made the special order for one day.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his motion.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. For what purpose?

Mr. COX. If we go into committee will not the Pennsylvania matter come up?

The SPEAKER. It will come up as unfinished business, but will not be a special order.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman can make a speech on any subject he likes.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman from Illinois wants to debate General Grant or anything of that kind, I have no objection.

Mr. STEVENS. I should like to move to postpone for some time to come the bill to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House, and no motion can be made in reference to it.

Mr. STEVENS. I am aware of that, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I ask unanimous consent of the House to have the further consideration of that bill postponed for some time. The discussion yesterday was not calculated to be of any benefit to the country, and I do not desire it to be resumed at present.

The SPEAKER. To what time does the gentleman propose to postpone it?

Mr. STEVENS. To Tuesday, January 26, at two o'clock.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The information called for by the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] will be ready at that time.

There being no objection, the further consideration of the bill was postponed till next Wednesday, at two o'clock.

TREATY WITH THE KICKAPOOS.

Mr. LOAN asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to this House a copy of the late treaty made on behalf of the United States by Major Keith, agent for the Kickapoo Indians, with said Indians for the cession of their reservation, or any part thereof, in the northeastern part of Kansas; and also copies of all evidence filed in said Department tending to show fraud or any unfairness in the procurement of, or in the execution of, said treaty, and copies of all other documents and papers relating thereto now on file in said Department.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed a concurrent resolution for the appointment of a joint committee of three members of the Senate and four of the House to inquire into the conduct and expenditures of the present war, with power to send for persons and papers, to sit during the sessions of either House, and to employ a stenographer; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

TREATY WITH THE KICKAPOOS—AGAIN.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Before voting for the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. LOAN,] I desire to have some information in reference to the treaty referred to. Unless the treaty has been sent to the Senate and become public by ratification, it seems to me to be improper to call on the Secretary of the Interior for this information.

Mr. LOAN. The treaty was ratified at the last session of the Senate; but on evidence furnished to the Secretary of the Interior, its operation has been suspended. The whole matter is now held in suspense.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the gentleman will amend his resolution so as to provide that the information called for shall be furnished if not incompatible with the public interest I will not object to its adoption.

Mr. LOAN. I agree to that modification of my resolution.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. LOAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution to instruct the committee on the Pacific railroad to report an amendment to the thirteenth section of "An act for the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean," &c., approved July 1, 1862.

Mr. STEVENS. I will not object if the resolution is so amended as to provide that the select committee shall be requested to inquire into the expediency of amending the law referred to.

Mr. LOAN. I accept the amendment as a modification of my resolution.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S REPORT.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution; and on its adoption I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the official report of Major General McClellan, not including the accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the members of the present House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The House referred to the Committee on Printing a resolution for the printing of ten thousand copies of the reports of Major General Grant. Has the committee acted on that resolution?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. They have directed me to report it back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman again, what is the probable number of pages of the reports of Major General McClellan; and what the probable number of pages of the reports of Major General Grant? If those reports are not too large, I would like to have them published in one volume. They may, I think, be printed and bound together.

Mr. COX. I can answer that question. The report of Major General McClellan will make a book about the size of General Pope's report, which we ordered to be printed to the number of ten thousand copies at the last session of Congress. It would not do to have McClellan and Grant together.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If that be the case, if the official reports of both those officers are not too long, I think that they had better be published in one volume. I therefore move that ten thousand copies of the reports of Generals Grant and McClellan be printed in one volume for the use of the members of this House. I move that as a substitute for the gentleman's resolution.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I understand that General McClellan's report will make about three hundred pages, and that the reports of General Grant will make a less number of pages. The committee instructed me to report the resolution as it is, or I would be in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I regret that the gentleman from Illinois has put General Grant in association with General McClellan.

Mr. COX. That is an insinuation unworthy of a member of this House. I wish to say to my friend from Illinois that the report of General McClellan, as provided by the resolution pending, will make a convenient book for distribution. It is of the proper size. To put both together they will make an unwieldy book.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Ohio does not desire that the reports of General Grant should be published in the same volume with that of General McClellan, I will not insist on it. If he prefers that the latter shall go by itself, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

Mr. STEVENS. I think that five thousand copies are enough.

Mr. COX. I think not.

Mr. STEVENS. The printing for this year foots up $560,000.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I cannot agree to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as the committee have instructed me to report the resolution as it stands.

Mr. COX. Ten thousand copies is the number of General Pope's report which we voted for last year. We intend to vote for the same number of the reports of General Grant. The people desire this report. Members receive hundreds of letters daily on the subject, and I think that we may as well distribute it in this way.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAJOR GENERAL GRANT'S REPORTS.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; and on its adoption demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the various official reports of Major General U. S. Grant during the war be printed for the use of the House.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLLECTION OF ABANDONED PROPERTY, ETC.

Mr. CLAY, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending or repealing the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," approved March 12, 1863; and that said committee be further instructed to inquire into the propriety of continuing or abolishing the present system of trade or commercial intercourse with and in States declared in insurrection, and more particularly in those States and districts bordering on and adjacent to the Mississippi river, and said committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

THE ONE HUNDRED DOLLAR BOUNTY.

Mr. LONGYEAR, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas by the provisions of section five of an act entitled "An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property," approved July 22, 1861, every volunteer non-commissioned officer, private, musician, and artificer, when honorably discharged, is entitled to a bounty of $100, provided he shall have served for a period of two years or during the war; and whereas by operation of act of Congress and orders of the War Department consolidating regiments below the minimum strength a large number of non-commissioned officers were honorably discharged, but without any act or volition of their own, and before they had served the full period of two years, thus depriving them, without any fault on their part, of the said bounty of $100, the promise of which, it is fair to presume, was in part the consideration for their agreeing to enter the service; and whereas a large number of other volunteers under the said act have been honorably discharged before having served the full term of two years, in consequence of wounds and other disabilities contracted in the service: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs are hereby instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of granting the said bounty of $100 to all such volunteers, under the said act of July 22, 1861, as have been discharged as above stated, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

LAND GRANTS.

Mr. McDOWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced the following bill; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories:

A bill extending the time within which the States and Territories may accept the grant of lands made by the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any State or Territory may accept and shall be entitled to the benefits of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, by expressing its acceptance thereof, as provided in said act, within two years from the date of the approval of this act, subject, however, to the conditions in said act contained.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from one of the standing committees of this House.

A MEMBER called for the regular order of business.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) to amend a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes;" and the pending question is the motion to recommit the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that other committees desire to make some reports to-day, and I therefore suggest that by unanimous consent this resolution lie over as unfinished business until to-morrow morning.

Mr. COX. I prefer that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BROOKS. I object to its being postponed.

Mr. WILSON. As I cannot get unanimous consent, I move that it be postponed until to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER resumed, as the regular order of business, the calling of committees for reports.

RESTORATION OF CIVIL AUTHORITY.

On motion of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 7) concerning the restoration of the civil authority of certain States, and of the United States, within regions once under the control of the existing rebellion, and that the same be referred to the committee on the rebellious States.

NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. HULBURD, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures, in their investigation of the alleged misconduct in the New York custom-house, as contemplated by the resolution of the date of the 11th instant, and in all other investigations which may come before them, be authorized to send for persons and papers.

CLAIMS OF JOHN J. BULOW, JR.

On motion of Mr. LOAN, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the papers in the case of the claim of John J. Bulow, jr., for relief from losses sustained in the Florida war, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Claims.

ARMORED VESSELS.

Mr. SPALDING. The Committee on Naval Affairs have instructed me to report back, with an amendment, the resolution introduced a few days since by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Nonro] touching armored vessels, with a recommendation that it be adopted.

The amendment was to add at the end of the resolution the following:

Provided, No call is here by intended to be made for information already transmitted by the Secretary of the Navy to Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

STENOGRAPHER TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer while conducting the investigation ordered by this House, at the usual price paid for reporting in the Daily Globe.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD TO NEW YORK.

On motion of Mr. ARNOLD, the Committee on Roads and Canals was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of certain citizens of the city of New York in relation to railroad communication between that city and Washington, and the same was referred to the select committee on the subject.

BUREAU OF EMANCIPATION.

Mr. ELIOT, from the select committee on emancipation, reported back, with an amendment, bill of the House No. 51, to establish a Bureau of Emancipation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. BROOKS. I would inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts what he proposes to do with this bill to-day?

Mr. ELIOT. I will say, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, that the majority of the committee have instructed me to report this bill. One member of the committee desires to submit a minority report. I ask that he have leave to make his report, and then that the reports be ordered to be printed, and the whole subject postponed for consideration until Wednesday next after the morning hour.

Mr. BROOKS. That is all right.

Mr. HOLMAN. With that understanding, I withdraw the call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I ask that the minority report of the committee, which I propose to present, be printed also.

Mr. ELIOT. I move that both the reports be printed, and that the bill be postponed until Wednesday next, after the morning hour, and be made the special order for that time.

Mr. PENDLETON. I object to making it a special order.

Mr. ELIOT. Does it require unanimous consent to make it a special order?

The SPEAKER. It does, except by a two-third vote on Monday. With that exception, the gentleman's motion will be considered as agreed to, if there is no objection.

No objection was made.

CAPITOL OF NEW MEXICO.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of a bill to provide for the speedy completion of the capitol of the Territory of New Mexico, and the same was referred to the Committee on Territories.

NIAGARA FALLS CANAL.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to construct a ship canal round the falls of Niagara; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

SMALL-POX IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a statement in regard to the small-pox in this District. It will take but a minute.

No objection was made.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. A resolution was passed by the House a few days since instructing the Committee for the District of Columbia to make inquiries and report to the House in regard to the condition of this District with reference to the small-pox. The committee have had several meetings on the subject, and have investigated it to a very considerable extent. The chairman of the committee, [Mr. LOVEJOY,] I understand, is at present absent in consequence of indisposition, and I desire to say to the House that I was one of a sub-committee appointed by the District Committee to examine into this matter, and I wish to state that there is no occasion for any unusual alarm in reference to the small-pox at this time in this District, and that the hospital accommodations provided by the General Government and by the city are ample.

Mr. KELLEY. I would inquire whether the investigations of the committee have satisfied the gentleman that the small-pox is not prevailing largely in this city?

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I will state in regard to that that there has been no time for several years past when the small-pox has not prevailed here more or less, but that there is no occasion now for unusual alarm on the subject, that extraordinary efforts are being made at this time to prevent its spread, and to take care of all those afflicted with the disease, and that the hospital accommodations appear to be ample for that purpose.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, by unanimous consent submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be directed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pension of non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates from eight to thirteen dollars per month, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ARNOLD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution to which there will be no objection.

Mr. COX. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STEVENS. I think we had better go into Committee of the Whole for general debate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If any gentlemen desire to make speeches, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAVES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. YEAMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of Congress to a series of resolutions I submitted soon after we met here. As they were only read by their title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, I will now have them read at the Clerk's table to bring them clearly to the minds of members.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Joint resolutions concerning the restoration of the civil authority of the United States and of certain States within regions once or now under the control of the existing rebellion.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, 1. That a combination of persons, in the name of a State, or an assumed confederation of States, for levying war against the United States, or for withdrawing such States from the Union, does not alter the legal character of the act done, nor excuse those engaged in it, nor does any such combination, levying of war, or attempted withdrawal amount to any destruction, forfeiture, or abdication of the right of those who at any time acknowledge allegiance and render obedience to the United States to administer, amend, or establish a State government.

2. That a formal return or readmission of any State to the Union is not necessary. It is sufficient that the people, or those who are loyal in any State, and qualified by the election laws thereof in force before the rebellion, shall at any time resume the functions of a State government compatible with the Union and with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and doing this is sufficient evidence of loyalty for the purpose of doing it.

3. That all questions touching property-rights and interests arising out of confiscation and emancipation, and the effect of any law, proclamation, military order, or emergency of war, or act of rebellion, upon the title to any property, or upon the status of any persons heretofore held to service or labor in any State, are left for the judicial determination of the courts of the United States.

4. That the whole power of the nation is pledged for the suppression of the rebellion, the execution of the laws, the defense of loyal citizens in any State, the territorial integrity of the Republic, and the nationality of the Constitution.

5. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to abridge or lessen any valid defense, or as waiving the right of the Government to inflict punishment; the purpose being to declare the nullity of secession as a State ordinance, to define the objects of the war, and to express the sense of Congress as to the proper mode of restoring harmonious relations between the Government and certain of the States and the disaffected people thereof.

Mr. YEAMAN. Some days afterwards, under the advice of gentlemen whose opinions I value, I offered the following three resolutions, the two first being slightly modified, in the hope of getting a vote on them:

Resolved, That a conspiracy of persons combined together and assuming the name of a State, or a confederation of States, for levying war upon the United States, or for withdrawing such States from the Union, does not extinguish the political franchises of the loyal citizens of such States; and such loyal citizens have the right, at any time, to administer, amend, or establish a State government without other condition than that it shall be republican in form.

2. That a formal return or readmission of any State into the Union is not necessary. It is sufficient that the people, or those who are loyal, in any State, and qualified by the election laws thereof in force before the rebellion, shall, at any time, resume the functions of a State government compatible with the Union and with the Constitution and laws of the United States; and doing this is sufficient evidence of loyalty for the purpose of doing it.

3. That all questions touching property-rights and interests, arising out of confiscation and emancipation, and the effect and validity of any law, proclamation, military order, emergency of war, or act of rebellion, upon the title to any property, or upon the status of any persons heretofore held to service or labor in any State under the laws thereof, are left for the judicial determination of the courts of the United States.

My motion for the previous question was not sustained; the resolutions were referred to the "committee on rebellious States;" so while the desired object of getting an expression of the House was not accomplished, I felt encouraged by the fact that no motion was made and sustained to table the resolutions. I believe they could not be tabled here; I am sure the nation does not reject them. I have framed and submitted these resolutions in good earnest. It is an attempt to express the law of the case. It is no attack on any party as such, and was not expected to dazzle the country as a glittering political platform. Speaking of platforms, my mind is coming to the conclusion that they, like some other Americanisms, have seen their day and served their purpose. They are generally framed to win, and generally forgotten if the prize is won, or abandoned if it is lost. I have already outlived some dozens of the most approved make. Moreover, honest men would find great difficulty in framing one that would suit even themselves more than a few months at a time, amid the rapid and momentous events of a revolution. They do not last long enough. The issue changes too fast. I speak now of political platforms, and not of legal principles. I have tried to express the latter. And let me here now predict that if our arms continue successful, (and God grant they may!) the great point of departure between loyal men—the thing about which they will differ in the next presidential contest—will be the mode and the means of restoring the Union and the Government. I believe the ideas I have tried to express in these resolutions can be made victorious before the people in that contest, and believing that, I will also predict that if those with whom I have cooperated demand much more in behalf of the past than is here expressed, they will demand an impossibility, meet with a disastrous overthrow, and neglect the only available barriers of the Constitution. Some make a dead anchor of the past. I prefer it as ballast and rudder.

I cannot be what is popularly termed a radical. If radicalism be a virtue, nature neglected me. But it is not all conservatism when love for the past blinds a man to the realities of the present, and excludes his mental view from the possibilities and necessities of the future. We cannot always control events, because what we call events are generally the effects of causes in operation before we were born, or before we came on the stage. But it is our duty to understand them, and we cannot do this without the courage to look at them. If we cannot command events we can at least see their meaning and direct and guide them, and mitigate their harshness, or turn them to the best account. In private life this is common sense and economy. In public life it may not equal the highest achievements of genius, but it is generally good statesmanship. Floods of opinion and passion, like floods from the clouds, carry upon their surface the debris of that they have broken. We may guide and direct it, levee it and dyke it, but if we dam straight across it, the dam and the builder will more likely be carried away than the flood will be stayed. Our duty is made the plainer by the fact that we from the beginning sought to extinguish the disparting volcano that has opened the floods upon us. But I am wandering from my subject. I desire some other time to discuss the causes and effects of this great contest. For the present my business is with the plan of restoration presented in these resolutions.

My entire political education, convictions, and feelings have been against that metaphysical system of State rights, State sovereignty, nullification, and secession that has culminated in the present war. I belong to the school of national politics, and thoroughly believe the lessons of the great masters Hamilton, Webster, Jackson, and Chief Justice Marshall. But I fear there may be danger now in a different direction. The tremendous struggle against secession, that political "galloping consumption," has not only developed to an extraordinary degree the strength of the nation, but, as if ideas must correspond with the conditions of material existence and activity, has so intensified and enlarged the idea of our nationality as a Government that there seems danger of a constructive and practical alteration of the whole system without any alteration in its wording. This is natural; it is one of the fruits of secession, but is likely to be carried so far as to need to be guarded against.

Were it in order I would move to amend the title or name of the special committee raised on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS.] I believe it is called the "committee on rebellious States." There are no rebellious States. Under our system there may be men in rebellion, but not States. I was as much gratified as astonished to hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] say a few days ago that there are no "rebel States." I hope he will go with me to the necessary and legitimate conclusion of that sound legal doctrine. I know that in common parlance this expresses what we mean, and is admissible. But I do insist that in the solemn forms of legislative and judicial proceedings we should name things and actions accurately, and not give to anything a name inconsistent with the meaning and operation of our system. When Luther Martin retired from the Convention and returned to Maryland, among the reasons he rendered the Governor of that State for his course, one was that when the Convention had defined treason, and empowered Congress to punish it, he asked for an amendment or proviso that when the act defined as treason was done in obedience to the command of a State the Government could not punish it, which was rejected by the Convention. That alone would demonstrate the character of our system, and that there neither is nor can be a rebel State—as such—though all the people in a State may individually be rebels. If our system were a Government of States, and not of men and things, so that a State, as such, might be in rebellion, I would see much room for the theory of territorial governments by Congress, or the resumption of State governments on conditions prescribed by the Legislature in peace, or the commander in war. In the plan I have presented I have carefully tried to avoid departure from the true theory of our system.

I deem it proper to state that these resolutions were penned before I left home to take my seat on this floor, and that at an informal meeting of the Kentucky delegation, before the organization of the House, I advised my colleagues of my intention to bring these questions, in this form, before Congress. I need not add that, though short and simple, they have cost me much labor and thought; and that, first and last, much has been rejected as surplusage, inference, or argument; and some substantive propositions have been discarded as tending to embarrass or complicate the one great idea had in view—a practical plan of restoration. I select the word restoration in preference to reconstruction, used in the President's message. The class of unconditional Union men to which I belong are not seeking to construct or reconstruct a Government, but to restore the one we had. We do not say we will only have the Union with a particular institution in some of the States, or that we will only have the Union without that institution. We will have the Government, from the lakes to the Gulf and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and if, in the struggle to save that Government, that institution has been affected or not affected by laws, orders, and acts about which there is a difference of opinion, we will submit their legitimacy and authority to that tribunal, that coordinate department of the Government, appointed by its founders to decide such questions. This is loyalty. Less than this, or more than this, is revolutionary.

Differing as I do with the President in regard to some of the leading features of his plan, as embodied in the proclamation accompanying his message, I must say I am gratified by three considerations. While suggesting one plan he does not exclude others; the plan itself theoretically precludes the idea of State suicide, forfeiture, merger, abdication, confusion; and the great point is admitted that in the end it is a judicial question. And this is a sufficient answer to it. If it be a judicial question in the end, or if Congress, as admitted, may act in the premises, and act differently from the Executive, any attempt at executive action, while it would not defeat ultimate action by other departments, does clearly delay it by presenting obstacles to the action of the people. Judicial or congressional action may not be had until a case is presented, and I must say that a case is not likely soon to occur in the manner pointed out by the President. And if it does, why should it be either delayed or incumbered by conditions precedent when it is admitted the conditions are not binding, but may be disregarded by Congress and the courts? I speak solely of the plan of restoration, and not of the conditions of executive pardon. Or rather, I speak of the conditions of pardon in so far as they are made qualifications of State citizenship. The two are either very unfortunately or very adroitly, for a given end, mixed together. While a rebel is pardoned on condition of doing a certain thing, the loyal man is required to do the same thing before he can participate in a State government. The advantage is with the rebel, when it ought to be with the Union man. The rebel by the oath obtains pardon and the rights of a citizen; while the Union man, for the same thing, is graciously granted what he never lost or forfeited, the rights of citizenship. This is a poor reward for his faith and his sufferings. The President may grant pardon to criminals on such terms as he pleases. If we differ with him, we can pass an amnesty bill. Many of the more wicked I would not have pardoned at all on any terms. But if we are not either wiser or more bloodthirsty than other nations, we will at the right time easily come to the point they have all reached in such cases, of pardoning the great mass of those who return to their loyalty without further conditions. In this particular republics and democracies ought not to be more exacting than monarchies and despotisms. It is not that a rebel deserves pardon, but clemency is at once more magnanimous and more economical than the extermination of a section or a party.

The President's plan loses sight of human nature and the movements of the social or aggregate mind in tumultuous and revolutionary times. There is no account of any considerable civil commotion—and none has been so considerable as this—being settled in so formal and minute a manner as the one indicated in the message. Great quarrels are settled by the fortunes of war and by the domination of great ideas and principles rather than through the formality of making oaths and recording them. We have attained our end when the idea and the forces of the nation have prevailed over the idea and the forces of secession, or national disintegration. Parties advocating either idea have raised a collateral issue about slavery, and have exalted that issue into paramount importance. Giving it that importance was a mistake, and the manner of conducting the controversy is another. If slavery prevails over the continent it will be by its own merit, and not by political secession and military aggression. If the genius of emancipation and "universal opportunity" prevails over the tradition of slavery, it will be by its own intrinsic force, aided by the "friction and abrasion of war," and not by forcing men to swear oaths they do not believe. My plan then is to leave this collateral issue where it belongs, and protect loyal men, and encourage tired and disgusted rebels in the good work of resuming the functions of a State government. We are told by the President, and I know it is true, that there are persons who have been engaged in the rebellion who desire to return to their loyalty. Shall they be encouraged to it or shall an impediment be thrown in their way? There are many more who have never abandoned their love for the Union though at times they had to hide that love as a profound secret to avoid violence. Shall they be encouraged or shall an additional restriction be thrown in their way by their own Government? It is not too much to say that a vast majority of the Union men of the South have been conscientiously opposed to the proclamation and acts of emancipation. Yet they are now required to swear to support them before they can participate in the affairs of a State government. Having fought the rebellion or hidden in the swamps and mountains to avoid its conscriptions they would hesitate to take an oath which many of them would construe to be moral perjury. The requirement is hard.

Moreover, many men at the South stand in mortal fear of the powers of the rebellion, and many men on this floor would do the same thing under the same circumstances. I rather think I would dread it, with all my conservatism. Those people have seen and felt its vindictiveness. They have seen that the fortunes of war are uncertain; that their persons and homes may one week be in possession of the Union forces and the next week in possession of the rebels. Like other men, they love life, and if they do not love their property, they at least need it for their families. Shall we require them to put on record an oath that makes them the registered enemies of that power, on a question and in a manner and form that would leave them less hope for quarter than the armed soldier in the field? It is believed they will not do it. A reverse of war would insure their destruction. A vast majority of the Union men of the South and tired rebels would acquiesce in any State government that is loyal to the Union, and abide by any decision of the Supreme Court about the effect of the proclamations and statutes affecting slavery, and enough of them would consent to take positions to put the machinery of government in motion, but we will not soon find a tenth of the voting population of any State come forward and register an oath on the subject. I doubt whether the few who believe in these measures would do it.

I do not quite see where all the power comes from to do this thing. It is not a military order nor a military measure. It concerns the civil government of States, of which the President is not an officer. It prescribes qualifications of electors unknown to the Constitution, and contrary to those fixed by the Constitution. True, it is only applicable to those who were voters under the State constitution, but it fixes new qualifications for these. If the Executive can do this because a part of the people of a State have done a crime, it is difficult to define what he may not do. If it be viewed as a question of the admission of new States into the Union, (which idea I wholly reject,) that is a matter with Congress, and not the President.

It is better to separate the two ideas of pardon and State citizenship. The difference is fundamental in our institutions. The man is a citizen of two governments, the State for one set of purposes and duties, and the nation for another. If he has sinned against the nation, pardon him or punish him as you like, or as public safety demands. If the same thing has been made a sin against the State, as in some cases in Kentucky, that is a matter between him and his State. We deal with him as a citizen of the nation. His capacity to participate in his State government is a question between him and his State, subject only to the rule that his acts, in the form of constitution and laws, must be compatible with the "supreme law of the land." Nor does such a participation in a loyal State government relieve him, in any legal sense, of the pains and penalties of treason against the nation; I would say, however, it would be a strong consideration in the question of pardon or amnesty. And this is the meaning of the resolutions I offer to the effect that participation in a loyal State government, or submission to it, is sufficient evidence or test of loyalty for that purpose, and that loyal citizens (loyal to the nation) will be protected everywhere. The protection of present loyalty does not legally relieve or shield the citizen from punishment for past offenses, but I undertake to say that in the settlement of this matter a return in good faith to loyalty will save the past in all but a few outrageous cases, where public safety and public sentiment alike demand punishment. The best proof and the most natural manifestation of a return to loyalty is to engage in the affairs of a loyal State government. This is what I would encourage. This is what I fear the President's plan will retard.

It is admitted Congress may receive members from the disaffected States regardless of the terms of the proclamation. How is this? The Constitution defines the qualifications of electors of Representatives in Congress to be the same as is required in electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The President practically fixes the latter, for at least one election, by his proclamation. If the requirement be valid, no elector can vote either for a legislator or a Congressman until he has complied, and yet this House may admit a member not thus elected. That is not consistent. It is hard to be consistent in times of great convulsion. We cannot be technical and be wise in the midst of a revolution. I think my plan is more consistent with itself and with the Constitution than the President's. But I will not be outdone in magnanimity. I will say the suggestion of my own plan shall not preclude the possibility of my supporting any other. I am too anxious for restoration to stickle about the form of the plan, so its spirit be in harmony with the theory of our system of Government. That system is harmonious and adapted to any emergency that has yet occurred. The proclamation is neither consistent with that system or with itself. Under it a State, or the people thereof, may have a full delegation in Congress and yet be without a State government because of their unwillingness to comply with the terms prescribed. This would be anomalous and not useful. The President yields the whole ground, as a law question, when he admits his terms may be disregarded by Congress and the judges. If Congress may repeal the law, or the Supreme Court declare null and void the law or the proclamation required to be supported, it was not only idle for him to do what he has, but it were better it had not been done, because it throws impediments in the way of some, and because it has an unpleasant savor of executive power. If the matter rests at last with Congress and the courts, we had as well let it begin there.

I would say that slaves once freed will not be remanded to bondage; but whether freedom has been acquired and the master's rights divested is a legal and not a political question; and the opinion of a citizen on this legal question is one which in no wise concerns his capacity or legal qualifications for administering a State government. Let him have his State government if he will have a loyal one, and let the slave have his freedom or not as the judge says is the law of the case.

The resolutions I have submitted embrace my theory of our Government, and of the proper treatment of the existing rebellion, and of the mode of restoring the Union. They are based on principles of constitutional law that have been much discussed pro and con., sometimes ably, sometimes acutely, and sometimes foolishly, since the formation of the Government. Touching some of the great and vital questions of law, I will state principles and deductions rather than the arguments by which they are sustained. These principles and conclusions will fairly sustain the resolutions I have offered, and condemn the plan of territorial governments for the people of several of the States of this Union, based on the theory of State suicide, and will exclude the power of any department of the Government (I speak not now of a constitutional convention) to prescribe terms for the readmission, as it is called, of any State into the Union. I will be careful to state principles so clear or so well established that few gentlemen, if any, on this floor will venture to deny them. I will go further, and show that the theory I assail is at bottom based on the validity of secession.

An ordinance of secession, either as the action of a State government or of the officials for the time being of that State, or as the act of the people of that State assembled in what is called a "sovereignty convention," is either legal or not legal. I hold that in any form and coming from any source it is illegal, null and void. If it be, as a law or ordinance, null and void, then it cannot, as such and of itself, affect the relations of the State or the people of that State to the Union.

Such effect, if any has been produced, must be looked for outside of the ordinance. There is nothing else to look to but the violence of the insurrection put forth to sustain the ordinance. But if that was void the violence to sustain it was a crime, at least an act not justified by it. Its legal character not being changed by the void ordinance, and being a personal and not a corporate act, the violence could not, in legal contemplation, affect the relations between the Government and the State or its citizens. It may have suspended for a time the harmonious or amicable action of the system, and especially of the State governments, as members of the Union, (if they are to be so considered,) but the same reasoning which shows that this violence amounts to State suicide would show with equal clearness a destruction, pro tanto, of the general or national Government within the same limits; for the same thing has happened to it that was done to the State government—violence.

I hold the Government, both in its origin and operations, to be one of persons and not of States. A Government of, for, or over States, is a solecism; and if the term States embodies the idea of sovereignty, even over a limited range of subjects, such a Government is an impossibility. One sovereignty under the control of another sovereignty, is a thought not very well explained by those who have urged it in defense of "State rights." It is as strange they have not seen that such a system would be the tomb of all State rights as that another party have not seen that their theory that void secession amounts to State suicide does really admit the validity of secession. For this term suicide or abdication has been invented, not to denote that all State government there is dead—for they palpably have a State government there, after a fashion—but to express that the State is dead as to the Union, and therefore the Union may establish a territorial government. If dead, what killed it? Not the ordinance, surely, else it was a valid secession. Armed violence suspended its operation, but so did it suspend the civil operations of the national Government within the same limits. The argument of de facto based on force, is as fatal to one Government as the other. Disease or foreign substance suspends the normal functions of the bodily organs—medicine or the knife removes the disturbing causes and the functions of health are resumed. If argument or the sword of the Government can remove rebellion from the limits of the States, the present abnormal condition is overcome and gives way, and the normal functions of "a loyal State government," as it is called, are resumed as of right by loyal citizens. The idea that interregnum is death is contradicted by all history, by all good reason, and by the public necessities of the case.

Treason or rebellion is a personal act, and not the act of a State or body-politic. Then the effect of the act, or the effect and operation of the law upon those who commit it, must be personal and not aggregate or corporate—not even political. It is too late to argue the constitutional right of secession, either State or personal. The argument has been transferred from this Hall to Bull Run, Fredericksburg, Chickahominy, Antietam, Vicksburg, Stone River, Gettysburg, Chickamauga, and Mission Ridge. But as the war would be a crime if secession were a right, I may be permitted to state some of the results of argument or principles of law upon which my resolutions are founded. Ordinances of secession being null and void ab initio, the subsequent illegal force of the rebellion did not impart to them any validity; and being void they did not of themselves alter, or in any way affect, the relations between any State, or the people thereof, and the United States. The actual force of insurrection did not dissolve the relations between the Government and citizens in rebellion, but only altered their present attitude toward each other. The duty of allegiance and obedience remains to the rebel, and the right to compel him remains to the Government; else a man or a whole community may at option become aliens by first becoming rebels. I say the relation is not dissolved though the attitude is altered. Allegiance and protection are said to be reciprocal. When the offense of rebellion is substituted for the duty of allegiance, the right to punish takes the place of the duty of protection. But the relation between citizen and Government is not sundered, else the right of punishment would be gone.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 15, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 13.

If these conclusions be correct; if secession be void; if rebellion is a personal affair between the citizen and the Government, it follows that the conduct of the rebel can have no effect in abridging the rights of loyal men, and that whatever effect his acts may have in fact in perverting the State government and interrupting its relations to the Union, yet, being not only irregular but illegal, it cannot in law affect the existence of the State government. His conduct may affect his own relations to his State, for loyalty to the Union or the national Constitution was required of State officers by most State constitutions; and surely, if his act be illegal, as all here admit it to be, it cannot be allowed to affect the rights of loyal citizens in the affairs of a State government. How far the effect of his conduct upon himself would be removed by his own voluntary return to allegiance, need not now be discussed. I only suggest that such return to loyalty, with all its rights and immunities, should be as much encouraged by the legislature and Executive, by statutes of amnesty and proclamations and grants of pardon, as is compatible with duty and public safety, remembering that while duty and safety will always require examples of punishment for so great a crime as this conspiracy, it will always be both impossible and undesirable to punish criminally whole communities of men.

If secession is void, and a combination of persons in the name of a State to secede or to wage war on the Government does not alter the legal character of the act done, and if the military power of the Government is limited to overcoming rebels in arms, it would seem to follow that the occupation and holding by the arms of the Union the territory of any State where the forces of the rebellion had temporarily suspended the operation of the laws of the United States—such insurrectionary forces being overcome and subdued—does not give to the Government, or any department thereof, any greater power or wider jurisdiction in such State than it had before such insurrection. I do not see how this conclusion can be avoided. I am not discussing the nature or extent of the war powers of the Government in suppressing armed rebellion. I will do that presently. I speak now of legislative power; the assumed power to erect a territorial government in a State after the rebellion in that State is suppressed, or to merge all the seceded States in a common mass and carve them out at pleasure, arraying the parts in such political attire as we please. This right did not exist and was not claimed before the rebellion. I have not been able to perceive how the rebellion conferred such power on the Government. If secession were valid, or being invalid had yet become a successful revolution, and the seceded States and their people had thus become not only hostile but alien and independent, and the Government had then made a simple conquest of them and their country as such, I could see, under the laws of nations and of war, room for territorial government, and even for the establishment of temporary civil government under forms and terms prescribed by the commanders of our forces. But that involves elements I do not intend to admit into this argument; and it is curious to my mind that the advocates of the doctrine do not perceive that it involves the admission of the legal right of secession or of a revolution accomplished by force. But it is said that the rebellion did in fact destroy the State governments as members of the Union, because there are no officials there to administer such a government in the Union, and therefore the territory is a tabula rasa, "a clean slate" whereon Congress may write laws. It seems to me that the chief attraction of the "clean-slate" argument to those who use it is, that at present they have the pencil in their own hands. The argument, or rather the comparison, for there is no argument in it, proves too much. If the mere vacation or abdication of office, or a refusal to discharge its functions, is not merely an abeyance of administration, but is such a dissolution of all government as to surrender and forfeit the civil capacities and political franchises of the "source of all power," then it is competent for a few executive, legislative, and judicial officers, by a treasonable conspiracy, or for an accident or assassination that would destroy them, to produce such an interregnum in the administration as will destroy the right of government in a whole commonwealth. An interregnum in the administration is all the rebellion has produced, and it has only done this in a relative and legal sense, as a State of the Union, for in point of fact there has been an administration there all the time. Does that suspension destroy either the State government or the rights of the loyal community of people still composing that body-politic? The error is in mistaking the officers of a State for the government of a State, or an interregnum in administration for a dissolution of the government compact, a determination of a corporate existence—the alienation of those things which our system declares to be inalienable. If the effect of the rebellion upon the administration of the State governments must be considered as an accomplished revolution, vitally affecting and changing their character and former existence, the remedy is still plain: drive the rebellion out of the State, and invite and encourage and protect the loyal people in accomplishing another revolution by wheeling the State government into the line of the Union. AND THEY WILL DO IT. Has anybody on the other side objected to the "provisional government" for the State of Missouri, which, for aught I know, was a necessity under the circumstances; or to the emancipation revolution that has been effected in that State in the midst of war? Who did these things? The loyal people of Missouri, who have kept the State in the Union. And suppose now the loyal people of Tennessee shall secede from secession, or simply resume a loyal State government without emancipation, who will stand up here and say No; especially when the whole subject is left, either with or without the consent of that State, where it belongs, with the judiciary?

If secession is illegal and void the States are not, in legal contemplation, out of the Union. That being so, no formal readmission can be necessary. All that is needed is for the national Government to defeat treason and rebellion in a given State, and then for the people of that State, or such as are willing, to resume the discharge of the functions of a State government in the Union. They can do this without conditions prescribed by Congress or the President, because a State may stay in the Union without any such conditions. They can do this under their State government as it existed before the rebellion, or under that government altered or amended to suit themselves, so that it be republican in form.

This may be objected to as not requiring in terms that the Union shall be restored as it was, and the States with all their rights as they were. The objection is not valid. The right of State amendment exists all the while, in peace or war, and if those who are, or have been, in rebellion against the nation do not choose to quit it and look to their interests and ideas in the State government, it is their fault, and not ours. If they will not care for their interests, we cannot do it for them, and be fighting them at the same time. And then, it does restore the Union as it was, because the Union is a constitutional idea, it is not made of this or that kind of property; and restoration of State governments in the manner I propose does not alter the national Constitution, but leaves it as it was, and therefore leaves the Union as it was. I mean, in plain terms, that I will accept whatever government appears to be fairly and regularly organized by the loyal and competent people of that State; and whoever requires more than this, either for or against any interest or institution, makes the destruction or preservation of that interest paramount to the Union. Such a restoration, in the manner I propose, of any State government to the Union, would be with all its rights, dignity, and equality, as a State government, unimpaired. If it comes back altered in form or detail, its relations to the national Government and to its sister States remain exactly the same. If her interests or domestic institutions of any kind have been altered by any means other than the wishes of the people of the State, I submit the mode to judicial scrutiny, and if the mode is approved as being the legitimate operation of a "supreme law," the State has not been wronged. If the mode is condemned as being incompetent, it has accomplished nothing. In either case State rights, dignity, and equality exist just as they did before. If the people make the alteration, it is their business. If they do not make it, it is their business, and in either case we have no right to require the contrary. This is my theory, and it is constitutional law. Under this theory, if Indiana attempts to secede, gets into a war with the nation, in the midst of the war is made a slave State, and, when tired of a foolish fight, comes back, she is restored to the Union with all her rights, dignity, and equality as a State government unimpaired. Some gentlemen on the other side would think not, especially as to her dignity. We will not discuss that. I speak of her legal and political status as a government, and cannot see how that is enhanced or lessened by the presence or absence of a given species of property. So if Tennessee attempts to secede, gets into a war with the nation, and in the midst of it is made a free State, or is made so when the war has left her borders and her citizens resume the exercise of the functions of a loyal State government, she is restored with all her rights, dignity, and equality as a State government unimpaired. Of course I speak with the limitation that the means to the end must be constitutional, and if there is a question about that, I leave it where other law questions go. But suppose Tennessee does not come back a free State, then what? "That's the rub" on the other side. Have we any more right to require that she shall than we have to require of Indiana, in the case supposed, that she shall come back with slaves? I have caught myself using the expression "come back." I only mean a restoration of a normal constitutional condition of the body politic. In common parlance it expresses what we mean. In law there is no coming back to do, for in law they are not gone out. And just for this reason we cannot prescribe terms, since we cannot prescribe terms upon which a State may stay in the Union. My scheme has no reference to nor is it at all incompatible with the right and the power of amendment in the national Constitution, which is not in abeyance, and exists with or without civil war. Nor does it impede justice or enlarge judicial power. The rebellion and congressional statutes and military orders and proclamations raised the questions and made them of infinite importance, and I propose to leave them where their character assigns them. The people of a State may resume the government they had before the rebellion, recognizing and establishing slavery, but they of necessity, under our system of Government, do it subject to whatever the courts of competent jurisdiction hold to be the "supreme law of the land, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." And though the action of that supreme law and the judgment of the court applying it to the conduct and estates of parties may affect the property interest of individuals, may change the title to a field, or set a slave free, or remand a supposed freedman to slavery, the State government, as such, is not injured. It was the operation of law on men and acts and things, and not the action of the general on the local government. I am told the proclamation of emancipation is no law. I was at much pains once to show that on this floor, and am of the same opinion still. But loving my Government better than my opinion as a lawyer, I will let the judges decide. And here let me repeat what I have so often said on the stump in my district, that being loyal myself, and living in a loyal State, I will not go to war with my Government on account of anything the President may or can do in regard to the African race in the seceded States. I warned them they would come to grief on this matter, and I shall not turn rebel because my warning went unheeded and my prophecy has been fulfilled.

The right of the loyal people of a State, who may be in a minority there, to administer or represent the State government and to bring it into action harmonious with the Union and the Constitution, has been attacked by the distinguished author and advocate of the territorial theory and of congressional power. It was necessary for him to do this. In polemics, as in the material world, it is sometimes necessary to displace one thing to make room for another. And what is his objection? It is that such a course is contrary to the spirit of our institutions, the right of a majority to govern. Then rebels have some rights left, according to this high authority. That is, in order to get the conclusion that they have no rights, he uses an argument based on the inferred or admitted right of rebels in arms against the Union so to shape and influence a State government as to keep that State out of the Union. If his theory were "a thing of life" I would expect it to blush for the support thus offered. The objection urged by Mr. SUMNER to allowing a loyal minority to make or administer a loyal State government, against the wishes, or, at least, without the co-operation of a disloyal majority, is yielding the whole ground in controversy. Admitting the right of a rebel majority to continue, without limit, their violent and illegal interference with the relations between a State, or the people thereof, and the Union, is clearly admitting their right to begin and consummate that interference. It is confounding the right of a majority to govern with the right that majority has assumed to secede. And thus it ever is with all who start out to make the Constitution or the Bible mean a particular thing: their arguments prove too much. In this case their logic, instead of proving "State suicide," does itself commit suicide.

There is another objection to my argument might be made with more plausibility. I affirm that the act of insurrection did not sever or dissolve the relations between citizens and Government, but only altered their attitude toward each other. Then the rebel is still a citizen of the United States, and of course of his own State, subject to the penalties and disabilities imposed by a violated law, as in Kentucky. But in some of the States the local law imposes none such as it does in Kentucky. Then it might be asked by what right or authority is he to be prohibited from a participation in that Government? I will not call this mere quibbling, but it is a clear misapprehension of the point made. There is no declaration or inference that he shall not do this thing, but only that he shall not, in doing it, be a rebel against the Union, shall not do an illegal act by violating the supreme law of the land. He may enter into the affairs of his State as soon as he pleases, only that to be recognized by us he must do it as a Union man. The resolution is guarded in this particular: "All who, at any time, acknowledge allegiance and render obedience to the United States." This is a broad invitation. If he do not accept it, that is his own fault. And if by his negligence the Government falls into the hands of a minority it will only be what has often happened in times of peace by the voluntary absence of a large proportion of citizens from the polls. The scheme does not inquire for the present or past opinions of persons administering the Government, but requires that it be a loyal Government. I mean by that one consistent with the Union and the supremacy of the national Constitution and laws; for it is true that under our system a State cannot commit treason. We judge the work and not the workmen; or at most the workmen by the work. If two constitutions are claimed to be in existence, one defining the State a member of the Union and the other defining it a member of the confederacy, we accept the former without counting votes. We can do nothing less. If it were not the technical law of the case it would be the necessity of the case. Shall we send out commissioners to inquire and report whether the Union or secession has the more supporters in a State? I would not only accept the loyal Constitution, but I would, to the last extremity, protect those who offer it against the violence of those who resist it. If a majority in a State revolutionize its government and establish a monarchy, shall we acquiesce, or declare it a Territory? Or shall we discharge the duty under the Constitution of guarantying "to every State in this Union a republican form of government" and of protecting them "against domestic violence?"

If parties in a State are contending between two constitutions, both loyal to the Union, but differing in details, that State is de jure and de facto in the Union, and has only presented a judicial question for the courts. The civil commotion called Dorr's rebellion did not take Rhode Island out of the Union or make her a territory, though it did, for a time, render it uncertain what the State government was. The Supreme Court decided in favor of the old "charter," and the fortunes of a short militia war, whose events would not now amount to a respectable skirmish, decided the question the same way. But if the courts and the militia forces had decided in favor of Dorr's constitution, Rhode Island would have still been a member of the Union. And when Dorr was released from prison, and his more democratic constitution supplanted the old crown charter, Rhode Island was still a member of the Union, with all her rights, dignity, and equality unimpaired.

"The whole power of the nation is pledged for the suppression of the rebellion." This is necessary for a consistent vindication of our principles in a matter involving the life and existence of the nation. And I would relieve the insurgents of any misapprehensions of a division among ourselves on this question. Let them be impressed by congressional as well as military action of the hopelessness of the task they have undertaken. Let the powers of the nation be pledged for their overthrow as rebels, and the same power and the judicial ermine be pledged for the protection of loyalty. I would carry in one hand the Constitution and "State equality," (equality with each other, and not "State sovereignty" over the nation,) and with the other hand, "the red right hand of avenging justice." I would lift on high the sword of the nation that they might accept protection from one or be hewn down by the cleaving edge of the other. The question of secession has to be met. It is of the essence of the case. It is the question whether the white man of this continent shall have a home, a country, and a Government, or only his wandering camp for a dwelling, and organized sedition for a constitution. Most unfortunately the only way we can at present meet secession is to meet and overthrow its armies on the field. I would it were otherwise. I wish we had been permitted to carry the question to some other tribunal. But the secessionists willed it differently. They made the issue of arms. The issue must be met and their armed power overthrown, or secession, as a ruling political element on this continent, is a success. Its overthrow is all that is needed. When that is done, when secession is yielded or conquered, and the NATION, as embodied and expressed forth in the Constitution—the covenant of the people—is acknowledged and obeyed; when that is done, and the negro or the slavery question remains the chief impediment in the way of settlement, I here declare before God and the assembled nation that, as a legislator for the people, I would not provide for the butchery of one child's father, one wife's husband, one sister's brother, or one mother's son of my own race and blood in the attempt to determine, by the further conflict of arms, the freedom or the slavery of the black race on this continent. Not being willing myself to die in such a cause, I would not require others to do it. Those who would will be able, I pray, to answer God and satisfy posterity.

I take it the only legitimate object of the war is to defend the Government, execute the laws, reduce to obedience persons engaged in rebellion, and protect loyal citizens wherever found; and that when these ends are accomplished the war ought to cease. If any gentleman will avow a different or an additional object, it devolves on him to show wherein he is not a revolutionist, a rebel against the Constitution. In limiting and defining the purpose of the war, I will not mince words or split hairs about "expressed powers" and "reserved rights." I state in general terms that this object may be accomplished under the forms and powers of the Constitution, and by the use and application of the laws and usages of war, as established by public opinion and international custom, in all places and at all times where those laws and usages are made applicable by the fact of war or the presence of enemies. In other words, I state that in resisting a rebellion of such power and numbers as that, under the laws of nations or by our treatment of it, it has attained the proportions of a public war, and acquired, or had conceded to it, belligerent rights, then "war powers" are a part of the constitutional powers of the Government.

The Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof are not only the supreme law of the land, but, within their sphere, they are the only law, and nothing can be law that is contrary to them. They were enacted for conferring powers for given purposes. And what does the Constitution embrace and provide for? Not peace alone and its interests, but war and its necessities. It recognizes and organizes the war-making power, the power to raise armies and navies, and the power and the duty to suppress insurrection and rebellion, and to protect the States against domestic violence. The minutiae of the modus operandi were not and could not be specified in a great organic law. They are the necessary results and instrumentalities of the power to do the thing. The fathers of the system understood the language they used; they knew the meaning of war, of civil war, of armies and navies, rebellion and insurrection, domestic violence, and "war powers," without which the right to make war would be a nullity. These war powers, or the usages and rules of war, are a part of the law of the land. The only question is their extent. They are ascertained and limited by the usages and sanction of nations. It does not alter the case that they may be or have been mistaken or abused—they exist. It is clearly agreed by all the authorities that when a rebellion or civil war assumes the proportions and importance this one has it must be conducted between the Government and bodies of insurgent citizens upon the rules of international law regulating the conduct of war. It is unsafe to say that these rules shall obtain in proceedings against persons and property except in so far as they depart from the letter of the written law regulating these proceedings in civil tribunals; that is to abandon the whole code and fall back, in every case, even in the midst of war, upon the requirements for oaths, writs, officers, juries, courts, and public trials, no matter with whom or under what circumstances you deal. That would be impracticable, and is not the law. It is admitting an inconsistency or repugnance that does not exist; war powers, not abused or exaggerated, are not inconsistent with the Constitution. They are scarcely cumulative, for they already exist. They are rather a dormant law brought into activity and application by the fact of war. Therefore I say they may be applied wherever war exists or enemies are found. But, says one, the Constitution requires an affidavit, an indictment, trial, jury, witnesses, counsel, and judgment of court—in short "due process of law." We all know the cases to which these do apply. Are there any cases to which they do not apply? Is there not a "due process of law" for an armed insurrection and all who aid it? There is; it is applicable to an armed and organized rebellion, commanding three hundred thousand soldiers in the field, with spies and emissaries and sympathizers in every State in the Union. For this state of case the Constitution provides war, "war powers." To complain that they are mistaken or abused is only to complain of men and not principles. The rebel waives the rights awarded him in the civil remedy, and lays himself amenable to the military remedy. His conduct brings a fact into the case which brings with it a law applicable to the case, or rather the Constitution has provided the remedy, and his conduct makes the remedy applicable to him. It is not so much a different or inconsistent law as it is a different state of fact to which the same great system, made both for peace and war, is now made applicable. Our "Bills of Rights" all say there are certain inalienable rights, and among these are life and liberty. Inalienable by the citizen and as clearly indefeasible by the Government. But in declaring this as a governing principle of protection did society waive the punitive power as a means of protection? Clearly not. Under the same constitutions and laws made in pursuance thereof, the same society, acting under this Bill of Rights, assumes to take both life and liberty in punishment for crime. And this is not inconsistent, else the world has long been mistaken. The incongruity is not in the law, but in the character of the act, fact, or condition to which different principles of law are applicable.

And at last what is war? It is an appeal from the civil law, the law of protection, to the law of force, the law of destruction, destruction of life and property under given rules, to compel acquiescence. Is that to be accomplished by sending against the enemy or his aiders and abettors an executive or ministerial officer armed with a writ and a copy of an indictment selected from the most approved forms in the "Code of Practice?" It has not been so held by mankind; they have answered force with force, and their Governments have been so framed. The theory of war is destruction, and the judgment of mankind, based on the necessities of the case, has invested it with certain powers; while the morality of mankind has thrown around it certain restrictions, in the interests of humanity, for economizing life, property, and suffering, as if anxious, while admitting the necessity of destruction, to make as little suffice as possible. Spies are arrested, detained, and executed without the intervention of civil process, to prevent surprise, information, or the destruction of a city or an army. This is conceded by each belligerent to the other as being in the interests of humanity. A thousand rebels are captured with arms in their hands, in the very overt act of treason as defined by the Constitution. But they are treated, not as traitors, but as prisoners of war, and exchanged as such; and this in the interest of humanity and under the usages of war. It might even be held with much plausibility that this is the legal right of the citizen captured in a war of such magnitude as to confer belligerent rights under the laws of nations; that if the Government claims belligerent powers it must grant belligerent rights as to persons taken in the act of war. I once thought the naked law (to say nothing of a humane and wise policy) was otherwise; I may have been mistaken, and will not now decide. If that is the law, another interesting question would arise where the Government obtains the possession of the person of a prisoner, not by capture in war, but by arrest under civil process, and proceeds to indict him for an act in levying that war. Would the manner of capturing his person alter his rights in the premises? I will not discuss that. The resolution is guarded; it declares that secession, as such, is no excuse, and does not alter the legal character of the act done; but also declares that no valid defense is lessened or abridged. If it turns out that a rebel is entitled to acquittal because the rebellion, in the stage at which he did the act, had become a war, I imagine enough cases can be found of clear guilt before that stage to satisfy the demands for justice. I would think a man's complicity in a combination and conspiracy to overthrow the Government and levy war against it, much of it written at these desks and sent to the press, the mails, and the wires from this Hall, and assuming the distinct form of levying war by raising troops for that purpose, would not be excused on the ground that a few months afterwards the fruit of his treason was a frightful public war. And this class of cases embraces all the more guilty and culpable; a thousand times more guilty than those who afterwards went with the excitement, the torrent, and the fear of the times, or obeyed the command of a remorseless power against which we were at the time unable to protect them. The laws of war, like the common law, existed and were understood when the Constitution was written, and both, if not parts of that instrument are at least its adjuncts. While recognized as a part of the laws of the land, they could not be defined or limited in detail in the fundamental law. That would have made the Constitution a library instead of an instrument. That duty or function is left to the department of the Government created for the purpose of defining, construing, and applying the law.

What objection can there be to submitting all these questions to the courts? Are they not legal questions? The arguments used to show that emancipation is or is not an accomplished fact show the question to be legal, and not political. Will any reject the proposition because they doubt whether the courts will agree with them? Then they would assume the functions of another department; they would be both legislators and judges, and substitute their own construction, it may be their prejudices, for the official judgment of a tribunal erected by the Constitution to determine such questions. I offer the resolution on the principle that we shall not both enact and expound the law, and then order its execution according to our exposition. I offer it on the principle that the President or a general shall not measure his own power, construe the law his own way, and then make the execution as broad as the measure or the construction, without the right of inquiry or appeal by the citizen. I offer it in opposition to absolutism, whether of one man or of many men; whether of the Legislature, the Executive, or of that form of democracy which, when met in the market-place in Athens to sit as a court to condemn (not to try) a general who had lost a battle, claimed the right to disregard the law because they had made the law. I offer it in vindication of our system of Government, that division of power that is the great safeguard of Anglican liberty—a department to enact, a department to construe and apply, and a department to execute. Congress may declare war and pass laws to punish treason, and the President may command armies and make military orders, but the letter, the spirit, and the history of our organized civil liberty—a history for six centuries written more in blood than ink—unite in demanding that the judge shall say whether, under these laws and these orders, the citizen has lost his estate or the slave his bonds. I offer it in the name of the Constitution we have sworn to support. I offer it in the name of freedom, (if my Republican friends will excuse me for saying so,) for while I differ with them as to the legal effect of a universal paper edict of emancipation, I yet hold there may be cases, I say not how many, in the progress of this war, and under the operation of laws for the suppression of the rebellion, in which freedom has vested; and I would interpose between the freedman and the local prejudice and violence that would reenslave him that ermine shield whose power is light, whose strength is purity. I offer it in the name of humanity; for when the slavery question comes to be the last question in this fight, seeing the impossibility of extremists to agree about it, and that they would immolate each other upon it as upon the altar of Moloch, it will be one of those cases, familiar to the profession, in which it is more important the law should be settled than that it should be settled either way. It is better the court should declare a negro a freedman, or declare him a slave, (not make him one,) than that the white race of this continent shall be consumed in an ignoble strife about the status of the black race. I say when it comes to that, a struggle for the supremacy of this Government is not ignoble. If any man is afraid the judge will not decide it aright, examine yourself again and see if you are not merely afraid he will not decide according to your way of thinking. Is the question too vast to be decided by that tribunal? That is begging the question. It is certainly too vast to be decided by prejudice and passion, the interests of disputants, or the uncertainty of war. It would be difficult to show that heated partisans and blundering generals would be more apt to decide a legal question aright than a tribunal whose study and usefulness and ambition and reputation are in discovering and defining justice and truth. I know it is not according to the habits of man in great quarrels that questions about the political and legal status of a whole race shall be thus decided. They have preferred to cut each other's throats until one or the other yields; may we not set a better example, and if there are those who do not like the decision, refer the question, not back to the battle-field, but to the power of amendment—the people in convention? That mode is not now available by reason of the condition of more than one fourth of the States. What we want is a feasible plan, by which States and people may begin to return to allegiance. My allegiance to the Constitution is so great, my love for the theory and the practice of our Government so profound, that I am willing any question shall be settled in the legitimate way pointed out by the system. The immensity of the interest and the august character of the tribunal win me to the proposition. There is a moral grandeur in the spectacle before which "the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war" do "pale their ineffectual fires." An agreement so to refer it would be the superiority of moral over physical courage, of intellect over force, and the spirit of law, the fruit of reason, over the chance and the carnage of battle. If one says "the courts will be arranged for the question," I say that is an imputation on the judiciary and on human nature; and moreover this suggestion comes from those whose opinions and theories have no hope elsewhere. The Executive is against them, the Legislature is against them, it may be that the Army is against them, and if there is any other power but the courts for them to appeal to, I have not been able to discover it. And shall I be answered by the other side that because there is so much power with them just now they will not risk a solution on the plan I propose, but will use that power to compel men to accept the scheme of universal emancipation? Then you have more confidence in your power than in your idea. If your idea ought to prevail it will prevail in the fullness of time, and the conduct of the rebel master has called into activity agencies and influences that may appoint the time fully as soon as the emancipated negro as a race will be able to bear it. You endanger your idea by exalting it too much and purchasing the consent not the conviction of mankind at the price of too much blood. At present, suppression of the rebellion is, in some quarters and in some degree, coupled with the anti-slavery idea because the rebellion seems to them in some degree coupled with the pro-slavery idea, and they hate the rebellion more than they love slavery. May we not yet be astonished with the phenomenon that resistance to our present tendency toward violence and sudden change will in some degree assume the pro-slavery idea, for reasons of the same sort? Reactions result from too much suffering, too much exhaustion; and generally reinstate an idea that seemed utterly overthrown. France would to-day have been a republic but for the excesses of democracy. Who in France in 1793-94 would have ventured to dream of monarchy any more? But the idea of submitting to the Consulate and the Empire was born of the idea of an insupportable anarchy and a bloodthirsty equality.

I do not fear the courts; the highest one in the land, in the disposition of a leading case on this subject, ruled some points that did not meet my approval; but they were the court and I was the citizen; they decided and I submitted. My confidence is neither lost nor impaired, and I must say that if the courts had, in the past, been a tithe so unscrupulous as legislative majorities, or half so grasping and variable as executive heads, the sheet-anchor of personal liberty and of all good government—an upright, independent, and learned judiciary—would long since have been lost to our race. No, sir, I have confidence, a confidence made cheerful and easy by the spirit of submission to the law—the law as expounded and decided. History and mankind will justify that confidence; I challenge it in others; if it is refused, I leave history and mankind to judge between us.

A word for the Union men of Kentucky and the border States. We are the most unconditional of Union men, as may easily be shown to you. One party will have the Union if they can have it with their theory of State rights and State sovereignty—they may have their theory if they will leave us the Union. Another party would have the Union if they can have it with slavery; and another party would have the Union if they can have it without slavery. We are for the Union and the Government, with the negro or without the negro. Understand me; we do not sanction efforts to destroy slavery as a means of saving the Union. We deprecate and denounce them as unwise and revolutionary. But we cling to the Government; secession assails it, and if between the two slavery is ground out as between the upper and nether millstone, so be it; we are still for the Government. The real character of our unionism has not been understood; we have been denounced as loving slavery better than the Union because we have tried to save the Constitution as well as the Union. Our unionism is not pro-slavery and it is not anti-slavery. The spirit, the chief element, the life of our unionism, is a thorough, profound, and elementary condemnation of the theory and practice of secession as destructive to all good government, and an equally profound conviction of the unity and oneness of our national Government as created by the Constitution of the United States. This is a just definition of our unionism; it rises far above the negro as a race, and far above the whole subject of slavery as a material interest, and reposes on that more exalted and serene tablet of the mind where history, guided by philosophy and justice, loves to search for the record of ideas and principles.

Mr. BRANDEGEE obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, who moved that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no conclusion, thereon.

WASHINGTON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. WINDOM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to incorporate the Washington Railway Company; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

THE NATIONAL FORCES.

Mr. FINCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill supplemental to an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill amending the internal revenue law so that all goods, wares, and merchandise, or articles, manufactured or made and sold by any person or persons, except spirituous liquors and manufactured tobacco, where the annual product shall exceed the sum of $600, shall be exempt from duty to that amount, or that said amount in value in such cases shall only be subject to the same rate of duty as in cases where the annual product does not amount to $600.

DUTY ON PAPER.

Mr. NOBLE, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas it is alleged that the amount of duty now received on the importation of foreign paper by the Government does not pay the increase in the price of paper consumed by the Government; and whereas it is also alleged that the present duty sustains and promotes a monopoly among the paper manufacturers of the country: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and are hereby, requested to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the revenue act as imposes a duty on paper, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish a Bureau of Immigration; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the select committee on that subject.

OFFICIAL CORRUPTIONS.

Mr. HOLMAN asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolutions:

Whereas it has been publicly charged that frauds materially affecting the interests of the Government have been recently committed by persons and officers connected with furnishing supplies for the Army, and that persons charged with such frauds and with the embezzlement of the public money and the appropriation to their own use of public property under their official control have not been brought to a speedy trial for the offenses charged against them; and whereas the existence of such charges uninvestigated is calculated to impair the confidence of the people in the integrity of their Government: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of seven members be appointed by the Speaker to inquire into and report upon contracts made during the present war for supplies and transportation for the Army, and whether the same have been made by advertising for proposals in pursuance with law in reference to furnishing supplies for the Government, and if not, the reason therefor, and the reasonableness of such contracts, and all the facts and circumstances connected therewith. Also whether contracts are let in accordance with the specifications inviting proposals, and if not, the reasons for the same; and whether any officer or person in the employment of the Government are interested either directly or indirectly in any such contracts, whether made on advertisement for proposals or otherwise; also, whether there has been any unreasonable and unnecessary delay in the proper trial of officers and persons connected with contracts for furnishing supplies for the Army and who have been charged with official misconduct prejudicial to the interests of the Government, and if such has been the case the reasons for such delay; that said committee may send for persons and papers, may examine witnesses under oath, and report at any time.

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] whether he has any particular case to present for the action of the House. Has he any particular grievance to which he can refer us as a ground for the action which he now proposes?

Mr. HOLMAN. I can name several which should be the subject of an investigation.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would be glad if the gentleman would name one.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the House thinks proper to hear me, I will be glad to name several instances calling for investigation.

Mr. GRINNELL. I only want to say this: let the gentleman from Indiana present to the House specifications and not general charges, and I will go as far as he or any other member of this House will go for the purposes of securing investigation. But I think that the pending resolution is too general. If this practice is to prevail I think that we might spend the whole of the session in submitting resolutions, appointing committees, and carrying on fruitless investigations. I do not want to stay the whole year here for any such purpose. I am opposed, therefore, to the passage of this resolution unless the gentleman from Indiana will bring forward specifications—name persons and particular matters, so that we may know exactly what we are doing. I must, therefore, object to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution then goes over.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has called for specifications, and I hope that he will not object so as to cut me off from replying to him.

Mr. GRINNELL. Of course not. I withdraw my objection so that the gentleman from Indiana may be heard.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the resolution contemplates an inquiry into two classes of cases, or specifies two subjects of examination. The gentleman from Iowa requires specific instances of fraud. I cannot refer to them all; this would be impossible. I must state a few facts as briefly as possible. If I thought that the House would have patience to listen at this late hour I might feel disposed to go into the subject more fully. What does the resolution propose? It first directs an inquiry as to what contracts have been made without advertising for proposals as is required by law; where such contracts have been made, the reason why the law was not complied with, and also in such cases the reasonableness of the contracts themselves. And secondly, and I think the more important point embraced in the resolution I have offered, is why parties charged with frauds against the Government have not been brought to trial before the proper tribunals. The gentleman from Iowa calls for special cases where accusations brought against parties for fraud against the Government have been delayed in being brought to trial. I will call the attention of my friend to the case of an assistant quartermaster at Cincinnati, Captain F. W. Hurr. So far back as last July or August he was placed under arrest, as has been uniformly asserted, by order of General Burnside, charged with the grave offense of fraud and embezzlement in connection with his official duties as a quartermaster at that post. I am informed that a board of officers, under the order of General Burnside, examined into the facts and reported on them, fully sustaining the charges. A court-martial was organized for the purpose of trying the case. This was as far back as August of last year. After many delays, for reasons which are unexplained, I am informed that the court-martial was dissolved without any trial of the cause. It is said, too, that the court-martial was dissolved by order of the War Department. Captain Hurr, instead of being tried, was ordered to Washington city in November or December, and since then, and quite recently, he has been remanded to Cincinnati, and is still at large and untried. I state with confidence, based not only on newspaper statements but on other sources of information, that the charges against Captain Hurr were of a most grave and serious character, and were fully sustained by the official examination, and involved other parties, and through all of this period and up to this moment he has not been brought to trial; that during the long months which have intervened there has been no investigation into the matter. I insist, sir, that when a public officer, I care not what may be his position or station, is charged with acts of fraud in connection with the discharge of his official duties, he shall be brought by the Government to a speedy trial for the offense, that the facts should be fully disclosed, so that the people may have confidence that public officers charged with official misconduct to the public injury will be punished. Unless that confidence can be secured in the public mind every department of the Government must languish, and the Government will lose that popular sanction necessary to a successful administration of public affairs. At a time like this public confidence in the honesty and integrity of the Government is of the first importance.

I could mention, but I do not desire to unnecessarily occupy the time of the House, many instances where charges of embezzlement, peculations, and fraud on the part of public officers have been made over and over again in the public prints, and where extraordinary and unaccountable delays have occurred in bringing the parties to trial and merited punishment. To ascertain the cause of these delays is a primary object of this resolution. If the gentleman from Iowa does not want these frauds investigated; if he does not desire the stream of the administration of public affairs to run pure; if he wants the public money frittered away in fraudulent transactions; if, in a word, he desires that parties charged in the public press and by the public voice with embezzlement of the public funds and official corruption shall not be brought to speedy justice, he should object to this resolution. If that be the position that the gentleman and the majority of this House occupy, the sooner the country knows it the better. So far as I am concerned, I do not ask that this resolution shall be passed for any party or partisan purpose, nor do I seek this investigation merely for the purpose of affecting the Administration in power. I am controlled, sir, by no such purpose, but by a sense of public duty, in seeking to arrest the speculation and fraud which now prey upon the country. If a public officer holding a public trust—I care not what may be his political creed—is charged with violating his trust and committing fraud upon the public Treasury in a tangible form, I shall vote to secure a prompt investigation. The people whose rights are involved may justly demand this. If the gentleman from Iowa objects to the resolution it may be weeks, or even months, under the rules of the House, before it can be brought up for action again. The responsibility is with him.

Mr. GRINNELL. The gentleman from Indiana has made an extraordinary speech in explanation of his resolution. I believe, sir, that I can speak for this side of the House that it has never objected to any investigation where there has been a specific charge of speculation, or that supplies were furnished without advertising for proposals. And this side of the House never will object to any such investigation in the future.

The gentleman now speaks of supplies being furnished without advertisement for proposals. I think his resolution said nothing about that matter. He talks about a gentleman from Indiana having suffered from the acts of General Burnside. Let him present in his resolution a particular instance of grievance, and I am one who will vote with any side of the House for an investigation. But here he makes wholesale charges, unsubstantiated and without specifications, and I am opposed to bringing forty different things—if I may use that latitude of expression—into one resolution. I will unite with the gentleman in investigating any particular case, and—

Mr. HOLMAN. A question of fact springs up as to the contents of the resolution. I trust my friend will hear the resolution again reported.

Mr. GRINNELL. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have limited this resolution to a particular matter of inquiry, to contracts entered into in connection with the War Department alone.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that unanimous consent is given to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. GRINNELL. I object to it.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution is not before the House.

Mr. GRINNELL. I wish to object with this understanding, that—

Mr. HOLMAN. If the resolution is not admitted, I object to explanation.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

OFFICIAL REPORTS OF GENERAL ROSECRANS.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which, under the rules, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That ten thousand extra copies of the various official reports of Major General William S. Rosecrans during the war be printed for the use of this House.

And then, on motion of Mr. SPALDING, (at half past three o'clock,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 14, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EMANCIPATION AND SLAVERY.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed as the special committee under the resolution adopted yesterday, to take into consideration all propositions and papers concerning slavery and the treatment of freedmen, Mr. SUMNER, Mr. HOWARD, Mr. CARLILE, Mr. POMEROY, Mr. BUCKALEW, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. CONNESS.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of December 21, 1863, a list of the names of all officers in the regular Army who, between the 1st day of December, 1860, and the 1st day of December, 1863, left the service, either by resignation or desertion, stating which, to engage in the rebellion against the Government of the United States; which, on motion of Mr. MORGAN, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement showing the expenditures for the contingent expenses of the military establishment during the year 1863; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, praying that the aid asked by the South American Steamship Company to establish mail communication by steam vessels with the countries of South America may be given; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have received a paper not exactly drawn up in the form of a petition as required by our rules, but it is in the nature of a petition from a person employed on board one of our naval vessels off Morris Island, South Carolina, praying for an increase of the compensation of paymasters' clerks in the Navy. It is in the form of a petition, but instead of being directed to Congress, it is directed to me as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. It relates entirely to proposed legislation of Congress, and is pertinent and proper for the consideration of Congress, although it is not, according to the rule, receivable as a petition. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to present it and have it referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There being no objection, the paper was received and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CLARK presented the petition of Silas Simpson, praying for payment for property damaged and destroyed by troops in the service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Frederick Miller, praying for indemnification for damages sustained by him in being ejected from his residence and place of business by a surgeon in the service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, praying for a grant of lands to make up the deficiency in the grant heretofore made to aid in the construction of the Minneapolis and Cedar Valley railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Wisconsin and Minnesota, praying for the passage of an act authorizing the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota to change their northern boundary line, to enable the State of Minnesota to purchase or exchange for the mouth of the St. Louis river and the town of Superior, thereby acquiring a suitable harbor on Lake Superior; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McDUGALL presented resolutions of the Legislature of California, in favor of the reduction of the tax on domestic wines; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from Keyesville to Union Mills in that State, and also a mail route from Crescent City, California, to Waldo, Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of California, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from Red Bluff to Shasta, and the establishment of post offices at Zelly's Ferry, Battle Creek, Parkville, and Buckeye in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a petition of acting assistant surgeons of the United States Army, praying that they may be exempted from military duty as soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. TEN EYCK presented the petition of William H. Conover and two hundred and eighty-three others, citizens of the county of Monmouth, New Jersey, praying for the enactment of a law providing for the establishment of a uniform ambulance system for the armies of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. COWAN presented a memorial of citizens of Bucks county, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the repeal of the $300 commutation clause in the enrollment law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of William Cornell Jewett, praying that the joint resolution of Senator McDUGALL, regarding France, may be promptly condemned as untimely, unjust, unwise, and unstatesmanlike; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a petition of citizens of Portland, Maine, praying that a pension may be granted to Jessie Gould, who was accidentally shot while assisting in discharging the guns and ammunition from the schooner Archer, taken from the Tacony pirates; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

RESOURCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FOSTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of the report on the resources of the United States presented to the International Statistical Congress, at Berlin, in September last, by Hon. Samuel B. Ruggles, delegate to that body from the Government of the United States.

REPORT OF THE ARCHITECT.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the report of T. U. Walter, architect of the Capitol extension, be printed for the use of his office.

WASHINGTON PASSENGER RAILWAY.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to communicate to the Senate whether the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company has made any report to Congress in accordance with the provisions of its charter.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES moved, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 59) to incorporate the Columbia Railway Company in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the bill be printed; and I desire to say in connection with this bill, and also in regard to one of a similar character which I introduced yesterday, that I know very little of the general provisions of the bills or of their merits. I only sought to inform myself as to the respectability and responsibility of the gentlemen whose names are mentioned as incorporators, with a desire that both bills, and all others of a similar character, should be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and be considered by the committee.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILKINSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 59) extending the limits of the northern Indian superintendency; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print five hundred copies of the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the annual report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds be printed for the use of the Commissioner's office.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert:

That five hundred copies of the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, and five hundred copies of the report of the architect of the Capitol extension, be printed for the use of their respective offices.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

DEAF AND DUMB, AND BLIND REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to whom was referred the resolution to print five hundred copies of the report of the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind, for the use of the institution, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution; and it was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the report of the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind be printed for the use of the institution.

CHICAGO WATER-WORKS.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 57, have directed me to report it back with a recommendation that it pass; and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider it at the present time. It merely authorizes the city of Chicago to use fresh water.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the title of the bill?
The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. "A bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois therein named."

By unanimous consent, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill. It gives the consent of Congress to the operation of the eleventh section, chapter fifteen, of the act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, approved February 13, 1863, entitled "An act to reduce the charter of the city of Chicago and the several acts amendatory thereof into one act, and to revise the same;" which section is as follows: "Said city shall have the power to extend aqueducts or inlet pipes into Lake Michigan so far as may be deemed necessary to insure a supply of pure water, and to erect a pier or piers in the navigable waters of said lake for the making, preserving, and working of said pipes or aqueducts; provided that such pier shall be furnished with a beacon light which shall be lighted at all such seasons and hours as the light on the pier at the entrance of Chicago river."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce what necessity there is for any consent of Congress to enable the city of Chicago to draw water from the lake?

Mr. CHANDLER. The proposition is to run a tunnel under the lake for about two miles, so that the city may procure water beyond the reach of the debris from the Chicago river. The Legislature of Illinois has granted them the permission of the State, and they now deem it important to have the sanction of Congress with the permission given by the State, it being navigable water. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

SECOND ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. WILSON. If there is no further morning business, I move that the Senate take up the bill (S. No. 50) to authorize the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint an officer in the War Department to be called the Second Assistant Secretary of War, at a salary of $3,000 per annum, to perform such duties in that Department as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or as may be required by law.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if there is any necessity for the appointment of an additional Assistant Secretary. There is one already, I understand. It seems to me that we are going on multiplying offices to a very great extent.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that early in the war we authorized the appointment of three Assistant Secretaries of War, but we limited the duration of office of the Second and the Third Assistants to one year. The time expired many months ago, nearly a year ago, and the office now is very much burdened. The present Assistant Secretary of War has been for several months during the past season confined by sickness, brought on, as he and his friends think, by over-exertion, and the Department is very anxious to add one more assistant.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not object to it if the Secretary of War says it is necessary; but I would suggest to the chairman of the committee whether it would not be better to limit the duration of the appointment to the termination of the war.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to limit it to one year if the Senator chooses.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will move that limitation.

Mr. WILSON. Say "one year or during the war."

Mr. JOHNSON. "One year" will do.

Mr. WILSON. We can renew it next year.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, we can renew it if it be found necessary. I move to amend the bill by inserting at the proper place, "for the term of one year from the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask to be excused from any further service upon the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FOSTER. The honorable Senator's services on that committee are very important, and I should be very sorry as a member of the committee to dispense with them. I do not wish, of course, to have him retained there against his will; but unless there is some very strong reason why he wishes to leave us, I hope he will continue with us. I can assure the Senate that his services are quite important to the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas that he be excused from further service upon the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE JOINT RULES.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, some time ago I proposed an amendment or modification of one of the joint rules of the two Houses. It is proper business for consideration within the morning hour, and I ask that it be taken up now for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont moves to proceed to the consideration of the resolution in relation to the rules indicated in his motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is now before the Senate. It will be read, and will then be open to amendment.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the first joint rule of the two Houses be amended to read as follows:

When amendments are made by either House to a bill, joint resolution, or concurrent resolution from the other, the course of proceedings shall be as follows:

1. The House originating the bill, &c., may, in whole or in part, agree to such amendments—agree to such amendments with amendments, or disagree to them.

2. The House making the amendments may in like manner proceed to act upon these proceedings of the originating House.

3. Should this last action not be agreed to by the originating House, and thereby produce a disagreement between the two Houses, either may recede from its disagreement, thereby passing the bill, &c., or may insist upon it, and ask a free conference on the point or points of such disagreement; appoint a committee of conference on its part, and send the bill, papers, &c., to the other House.

4. The latter House may also insist upon its disagreement—agree to the conference, and appoint a committee on its part.

5. The joint committee of conference may then proceed freely to confer upon the point or points of disagreement between the two Houses, but shall not be at liberty to affect any other part or parts of the bill, &c., already agreed to by both Houses; and shall promptly make report of the result of such conference to their respective Houses, the bill, papers, &c., being brought into the House first proposing the conference.

6. This latter House shall first act upon the report of the committee; its action upon the report shall then be sent, with the bill, papers, &c., to the other House, which may then also act upon it.

7. Should the committees, respectively, report a disagreement between themselves, second committees may be appointed, who shall proceed in like manner as the first.

8. Should the second committees agree to a common report for settling the disagreement between the two Houses, it will be made to the respective Houses, upon which the Houses will act as stated in the sixth article of this rule.

9. Should the second committees disagree, the fact will be reported to the respective Houses, as in the first instance, and the House asking the second conference shall first act upon this second report.

10. The term of conference being then passed, this House may recede from its disagreement, which will pass the bill, &c., or, by a simple resolution, it may state its reasons and adhere to its disagreement, or it may simply adhere to its disagreement, and send the bill, papers, &c., to the other House.

11. The other House may then proceed in the same manner, and should this House recede from its disagreement, the bill, &c., will be passed; but should this House adhere, with a statement of its reasons or not, the bill, &c., will then be lost.

12. Should a bill, &c., be thus lost or defeated, such parts of the same, verbatim et literatim, as may have been agreed to by both Houses, and have not been effected by any disagreement between the two Houses, may, in either House, be immediately introduced as a new bill, &c., by any member thereof, and shall take precedence of all other business, and be acted upon in all its readings and stages immediately and without debate, and if passed, shall forthwith be sent to the other House for concurrence, which House shall, in like manner as the first, immediately proceed to act upon the said bill, &c.; and should this House also pass this bill, &c., notice thereof shall immediately be sent to the first House, and the bill, &c., may immediately be signed by the Presiding Officers of the two Houses, as other bills, &c., are signed, and presented to the President of the United States for his approval or disapproval, as in other cases.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, a few words by way of explanation will perhaps be all that may be required in order to show the importance, and sometimes, indeed, as I think, the urgent need of some such amendment or modification of the first joint rule of the two Houses of Congress as that which is now before us. I will ask for the reading of the first joint rule of the two Houses of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.
The Secretary read, as follows:

"1. In every case of an amendment of a bill agreed to in one House, and dissented to in the other, if either House shall request a conference, and appoint a committee for that purpose, and the other House shall also appoint a committee to confer, such committees shall, at a convenient hour, to be agreed on by their chairmen, meet in the conference chamber, and state to each other verbally or in writing, as either shall choose, the reasons of their respective Houses for and against the amendment, and confer freely thereon."

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, it will be observed that this rule as it now stands merely provides for the first or preliminary stage of proceeding in case of disagreement and conference between the two Houses of Congress, and consequently, leaving all subsequent proceedings thereon to be regulated and controlled by the common parliamentary law, or those rules of practice which have been adopted from time to time through a long series of years and from an early period by the British Parliament—rules, many of which are incoherent, many of them vague and indefinite, and many of them inapplicable to the more simple forms of legislative proceedings in our Government, and which have sometimes enabled a factious few arbitrarily to oppose a successful resistance to the will of the great majority, and to defeat for the time being important and even vital public measures. It will be observed, however, that all the articles of the proposed amendment, with very little variation, if any at all except the last article, are but the expression of the common parliamentary law or modes of proceeding on questions of disagreement and conference between the two Houses of Congress. It is only the last article of the proposed amendment which proposes any material innovation or change in the existing parliamentary rules of practice. It is to this article, therefore—to the proposed change or rather the proposed addition to the present parliamentary process on questions of disagreement and conference between the two Houses of Congress—that I invite the particular attention of Senators.

It will be seen that it merely provides a simple and summary process by which the main body of a bill, essential, perhaps, to the support, and, it may be, to the very existence of the Government itself, may be saved and become a law, notwithstanding the final disagreement of the two Houses of Congress, as is not unfrequently the case, upon some mere technicality or upon some trivial and comparatively unimportant matter which it may contain. I submit that it is not a wise rule, that it is not a practical rule, that it is not indeed a sensible rule, under the operation of which an entire bill, however important to the public interest, must necessarily be lost because of the final disagreement of the two Houses upon some trivial and comparatively immaterial portion of it; and it is only strange, indeed, that such a rule of ancient and foreign origin, and incompatible with the principles of our system of Government, where majorities express the popular will and speak the law, should have so long obtained a place in the proceedings of American legislation.

It is hardly necessary to say, Mr. President, that each House of Congress for itself, and that the two Houses concurrently have often times, in other cases, made rules for themselves in accordance with their own judgment and in conformity with their own peculiar circumstances and condition, and, thus so far forth, superseding the common parliamentary law. This is done under the authority of that clause of the Constitution which declares that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings;" and rules so determined are, to that extent, paramount to, and necessarily take the place of, all other rules in the government and proceedings of the respective Houses. Is it not reasonable and proper, when experience has shown that certain rules of practice made by a foreign Government, and in ancient times by other parliamentary bodies, are unsuited to the more simple forms of legislative proceedings of the Congress of the United States, that it should set aside such rules and frame others in their stead better adapted to its own condition and circumstances, and better calculated to regulate and facilitate its own practice and proceedings?

The want of some plain, practical, explicit joint rule regulating the mode of proceedings upon questions of disagreement and conference between the two Houses of Congress has long been felt as a very serious one, and has been the occasion oftentimes of very serious inconvenience, and in some instances of the loss of very important public measures. In Congress, as in all other legislative bodies, disagreements upon bills and consequent committees of conference upon them take place for the most part near the close of the session, when time is precious, when the time for consideration of measures is short, and when, as the experience of all of us has shown, many of the most important measures of the session are crowded into a brief space, into the space of a few days, and sometimes even of a few hours. And it is at such a time as this and under these circumstances that proceedings upon disagreements and consequent conferences, and persistent and repeated disagreements perhaps, oftentimes upon some trivial portion of a bill, have caused the loss of the entire bill, vital, though it may be, to the operations of the Government, and at a period of the session when there is not time to renew the bill, divested of contested matter, with any hope or prospect of its passage under our present rules, when a single objection may arrest its progress or defeat its passage.

There are two recent instances of this kind which are doubtless within the recollection of Senators; one instance to which I refer was that of the loss of the Army appropriation bill during the administration of Mr. Pierce, and which rendered it necessary to recall Congress immediately. The other instance to which I refer was that of the loss of the General Post Office appropriation bill a few years ago, during the administration of Mr. Buchanan. The loss of that general appropriation bill by a single objection at the last day and the last hour of the closing session of a Congress, caused very serious inconvenience and indeed serious embarrassment in the operations of that Department.

Now, to avoid these serious consequences, and to render all such proceedings upon bills plain and simple and easily understood, and finally by a summary process to rid those bills of all contested matter upon which, after reasonable trials, it has been found impossible to bring the two Houses to an agreement, this rule is proposed, which, if adopted, can hardly fail to have the effect of saving so much of the bill as has been actually agreed to by both Houses, and yet at the same time giving both Houses the opportunity of reaffirming or reversing their previous agreement to such parts of a bill.

Mr. President, I see no possible objection to the adoption of this rule, while there are, on the other hand, many and urgent considerations in favor of it. But with these explanatory remarks I shall submit the question to the better judgment of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have read carefully the proposed amendments to the rules, and I agree that they are wise and ought to be adopted. There are two points, however, to which I would call the attention of the Senator from Vermont, who perhaps will agree with me upon them. The fifth clause of the proposed new rule prohibits a committee of conference from changing the text of the original bill already agreed upon. That is the general parliamentary rule; but there are often cases where the text already agreed upon is inconsistent with the report of the committee of conference, and it must be modified in some slight respect. I have known in practice several cases of that kind where it became necessary to change the text of the original proposition in order to make it conform to the meaning of the amendments agreed upon by the committee of conference. I propose, then, with the Senator's consent, to insert in the fifth clause of the proposed rule, after "Houses," in the fourth line, these words: "unless they pertain to or affect the meaning of the points of disagreement;" so as to make that clause read:

The joint committee of conference may then proceed freely to confer upon the point or points of disagreement between the two Houses, but shall not be at liberty to affect any other part or parts of the bill, &c., already agreed to by both Houses, unless they pertain to or affect the meaning of the points of disagreement.

Mr. FOOT. I see no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. I am aware that there have been within my own experience some three or four instances where it has been desirable that a committee of conference should change the body of a bill already agreed to by both Houses of Congress but excluded from the jurisdiction and consideration of the committee of conference by the general rule under which those proceedings are regulated. If it can be confined to such parts of a bill as on the face of them are inconsistent with other portions of the bill, and not open the whole bill, which the two Houses have agreed upon, to the consideration and modification of a committee of conference, I have no objection to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is my purpose; and if I have not used the correct words to express it, I hope the Senator will propose them.

Mr. FOOT. I think the words are apt and brief.

Mr. SHERMAN. The next difficulty I have is upon the last proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question will first be taken upon the Senator's first amendment, to insert at the end of the fifth clause the words "unless they pertain to or affect the meaning of the points of disagreement."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. The sixth line of the twelfth clause requires action upon the new bill in both Houses immediately and without debate. I do not think the Senate ought to surrender its right to debate any proposition, especially so important a proposition as the passage of a bill. A slight explanation may change the minds of Senators. In the House of Representatives, under their rules, by the previous question they can cut off debate. I do not think it desirable to cut off debate in the Senate on all occasions. If there were any way to limit the debate, I should have no objection to that; but to require a bill to be passed through all its stages in the Senate without debate, without explanation, without any opportunity to make a suggestion, seems to me rather an arbitrary proceeding. I would prefer this rule if the words "and without debate" were stricken out. I think there will be no practical difficulty if we strike those words, and I therefore move to strike them out.

Mr. FOOT. That simply defeats the whole object of the proposed rule. The Senator will recollect, although he was not then a member of this body but of the other House, I think, that a few years ago the General Post Office appropriation bill was defeated by debate, speaking against time, purposely and avowedly to kill the bill. The proposed rule provides that only so much of a bill as has been agreed to by both Houses, as has gone through all the ordinary stages of legislative proceedings, as has been fully debated so far forth as any member of either House has chosen to debate it at every stage of its proceeding—not any new matter, but only so much of a bill as has gone through a full and considerate deliberation of both Houses—shall be put through without debate. If you admit debate then, your bill is lost; you are where you were before without this proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. Rather than endanger the passage of this resolution, I prefer to withdraw my amendment, as I see the importance of passing the amendatory rule. At the same time I think it is dangerous.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me that as we have adopted the other proposition of the Senator from Ohio, we ought to adopt this; or at least, if we adhere to the resolution as submitted by the Senator from Vermont, we ought to reconsider our vote on the other proposition of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken. The other proposition relates to a bill in its prior stages, when it is all open to debate.

Mr. GRIMES. But the committee of conference, under the resolution as now amended by the Senator from Ohio, has the right to modify the language of any of its provisions.

Mr. SHERMAN. Only so far as they affect the meaning of the language of the disagreeing votes.

Mr. GRIMES. But who is to judge of that? The committee of conference. When they come in here with a modified proposition and submit it to the Senate, they will say that they have only made some slight modifications, some slight changes. I may be satisfied that they are not giving the right construction to that language; and yet under the rule as it now stands I am not permitted to say to the Senate what my opinion is on that subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. With due deference to the Senator, he is very much mistaken. The bill is then open to debate. At that stage the Senator can debate it at any length. The debate under the twelfth proposition is only cut off when the two Houses have disagreed, and a new bill is introduced and passed through the forms of legislation without reference to the action of the committee of conference. In the case put by the Senator from Iowa, the bill together with the report of the committee of conference would be open to debate, and the Senate by a majority vote could disagree to the report of the committee of conference and refer the bill to another committee of conference, so that there would be no practical difficulty.

Mr. GRIMES. If debate is free on that modification, I am satisfied.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perfectly so. Debate is not cut off except on the final action after all conferences have failed, and when a new bill has been introduced and is on its passage.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Vermont if he cannot accomplish further good in this same direction by changing another rule or another practice which has obtained here in the Senate; that is, as to the form in which the question shall be put upon the coming in of a report from a committee of conference. As I understand the practice, it has been heretofore that the question is upon agreeing to that report.

Mr. FOOT. Concurring in the report as an entirety.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator now proposes a modification of the rule which will enable us to save a part of a bill when there is a persistent disagreement as to other portions. If, when the report of a committee of conference comes in, instead of putting the question to the House whether they will agree or disagree to the report, the question be put upon adhering or receding from each of the different propositions which were submitted to the committee of conference, it seems to me we might secure an agreement between the two Houses much further, to larger portions of the bill, than we do by putting the question as is now done, and then the twelfth clause of this proposed amendment would be of greater utility, as it seems to me, than it will be as it stands. I make the suggestion. I shall move no amendment.

Mr. FOOT. I listen to the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin with great respect, and I shall be very happy to consider with him the proposition which he suggests if he will present it in a separate and distinct form. I would rather he would not propose it as an amendment to my proposition: I disagree with him entirely as to the effect of such a rule. I think it is a matter of absolute practical necessity that the question upon the report of a committee of conference should be put upon agreeing to the report, or concurring in the report as an entirety by the Senate or the House of Representatives when the report is made. Such a proposition as he has made would defeat the whole object and purpose of a committee of conference to settle differences between the two Houses, because it would bring the two Houses at odds again upon the same questions upon which they had before disagreed and on questions upon the bill itself. But I repeat, I shall be very happy to consider the Senator's proposition if he will bring it in a separate and distinct form and will not urge it as an amendment to this proposition of mine now pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order.

Mr. FOOT. I hope the question may be taken. I suppose there will be no further debate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire if this proposed change of our rules has been under the consideration of any committee.

Mr. FOOT. It has not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It strikes me as a very great innovation to limit debate in this body. The Senate has always refused to adopt the previous question, or to place any other limit upon debate than that which the sense of propriety of every Senator fixes for himself. I was here for some years in a minority, and I thought the right of debate a very sacred privilege. Being now in the majority, I am not disposed, for one, to adopt a rule that shall limit debate in this body. I know we have at times been subjected to inconvenience by debates which seemed to be unreasonable, by opposition, which seemed to be factious and for the mere purpose of delay; but for one I would rather submit to that inconvenience than to establish in this body a rule that would prevent the full consideration of every subject coming before the Senate. At all events, I think that so important a change as this ought to be well considered by the Senate before it is adopted. I do not know but that the proposed rule in other respects, as to the mode of passing a bill about which the two Houses have disagreed, may be the very best that could be adopted, but I would prefer myself that it should not be pressed to a vote this morning, at any rate.

Mr. FOOT. Let it go to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which the Senator from Illinois is chairman, that he may consider that question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no wish to take charge of it.

Mr. FOOT. It defeats the whole object of the rule if a bill is left open to debate at that stage where it proposes to cut off debate; and I repeat again, it prevents debate only upon questions which have been considered fully and deliberately in both Houses before, and have passed the ordeal of the concurrence of the two Houses after a full debate. It is not the case of shutting down debate on a question which has not been heard. Open it to debate, and you defeat the object of the rule, and your whole bill is lost—that upon which the two Houses have previously agreed. It was that debate against time, when there was but half an hour left of the session, that lost the appropriation bill for the General Post Office four years ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of yesterday is appropriately before the Senate, and this debate cannot be pursued unless by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senate would allow me, I should like to answer that last suggestion while it is before the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will be better to let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will occupy but one moment. It is merely to say, if the Senate will indulge me, that I do not exactly understand it as the Senator from Vermont does, that this cutting off of debate is upon matters about which the two Houses have entirely agreed. It is true it is on a part of the bill that both Houses have agreed to, but yet neither House has agreed to pass that part without the other; and therefore it is a new question in each House whether they will be willing to take this portion of the bill which might be very materially modified and changed by the other parts which each House has insisted upon. So it does not strike me that it is a question which has been fully discussed in the two Houses whether the bill in that shape should pass or not.

Mr. FOOT. I move the reference of the proposition to the Committee on the Judiciary. I think perhaps it had better pass the ordeal of the examination of some one of the standing committees of the body, inasmuch as objection is made. I supposed the proposition would meet with unanimous favor after the experience we have already had.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

OATH OF OFFICE.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who is not now in his seat, would be glad to be heard on the subject of the proposed rule of the Senate offered by me, to-morrow, at some time, say at half past twelve o'clock. I therefore ask the Senate to take that up now and make it a special order for that hour to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion can be entertained only by the unanimous consent of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection. The proposed rule is therefore before the Senate. The Senator from Massachusetts now moves to postpone it until to-morrow, and make it a special order for half past twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, two thirds of the Senate concurring therein.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution of the Senate:

A bill (No. 57) declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois therein named; and

A joint resolution (No. 15) amendatory of the joint resolution to supply in part deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounties to volunteers.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on the 13th instant, the following joint resolutions:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 15) to provide for the printing, annually, of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 16) to continue the bounties heretofore paid.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate, being the bill No. 36.

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to a question of privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his question.

Mr. DAVIS. It is that the question before the Senate is upon the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] for my expulsion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not in the impression of the Chair. That resolution was postponed by a special vote of the Senate, and the other bill was taken up before the adjournment yesterday. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] moved to postpone the subject to which the Senator from Kentucky refers, and it was postponed by the vote of the Senate. Then the unfinished business of the day preceding came up, and on that the Senate adjourned. That is the recollection of the Chair.

Mr. DAVIS. I barely ask leave to suggest this question: if when there is no subject before the Senate, a question of privilege is not always in order, and does not always supersede all other business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the impression of the Chair it does, precisely as the Senator from Kentucky says.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, I conceive that to be the position of business before the Senate at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair disagrees with the Senator in that. The bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The pending question is on an amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs. Both amendments will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of the committee, which was to add the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved on the 3d day of March, 1863, as authorizes the discharge of persons drafted into the service of the United States under the authority of that act upon the payment of a sum of money not exceeding $300, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment of Mr. WILSON was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the proposed section, and to insert:

That any person enrolled and drafted may pay to such person as the Secretary of War may designate to receive it, $300 for the procurement of a substitute, and such person so paying $300 for the procurement of a substitute shall be exempt from draft until such time as he shall again become liable to draft by reason of the exhaustion of the enrollment from which the draft shall be made, but such exemption shall not exceed the time for which such person shall have been drafted: Provided, That any married person not possessed of property who labors for a livelihood at some trade or occupation, the annual income from which does not exceed $400, shall pay $200: And provided further, That any person whose taxable property shall exceed $10,000, or who may be in receipt of an annual income exceeding $2,000, shall pay $500.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to inquire whether that is open to amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is an amendment to an amendment, and is not open to amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will take off the last part of it.

Mr. WILSON. At the suggestion of several Senators about me, I propose to modify the amendment by omitting the two provisos.

Mr. COLLAMER. Very well; that is all I want.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to take the question simply upon the first portion of my amendment. I desire not to embarrass a direct vote upon the question of striking out the $300 clause, and I hope we shall be able to get a vote upon it.

Mr. COWAN. Allow me to suggest to the chairman of the Military Committee whether we had better not act first upon the question as to the time for which drafted men shall be called out. If we shorten the time, that may have a material bearing upon the sum put into the bill for commutation, because it may be one thing to exempt a man for $300 from service for one year, and another to impose that same sum for exemption for three years. I think that the question of time should be fixed first and then we can adjust the commutation clause.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Massachusetts have the goodness to state precisely what is his modification of his amendment?

Mr. WILSON. I propose to omit the two provisos, so that my amendment shall read:

Any person enrolled and drafted may pay to such person as the Secretary of War may designate to receive it, $300 for the procurement of a substitute, and such person so paying $300 for the procurement of a substitute shall be exempt from draft until such time as he shall again become liable to draft by reason of the exhaustion of the enrollment from which the draft shall be made, but such exemption shall not exceed the time for which such persons shall have been drafted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on striking out all of the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs after its enacting clause, and inserting the words just read.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for a division of the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not divisible. By the rules of the Senate a motion to strike out and insert cannot be divided.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the amendment suggested be adopted, I ask the chairman of the committee whether that will repeal the original provision.

Mr. WILSON. It does not repeal it, but modifies it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Had you not better repeal it?

Mr. WILSON. I think it is not necessary to do it in that form. This makes the provision more clear and distinct. It is a simple provision. The Committee on Military Affairs have reported a section proposing to repeal the commutation clause. This amendment, in lieu of that, provides that a person drafted may pay a commutation of $300 for procuring a substitute, and that his name shall still go on the enrollment list to be called for when persons who have not been drafted have been called for.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand it thoroughly. That is not my point. The bill, as originally proposed by the committee, repeals the antecedent law under which the commutation of $300 could be paid, by the payment of which the party was discharged from all draft. I know that lawyers are very ingenious sometimes; and particularly when they are in the Departments they are exceedingly ingenious. I am not by any means certain that it will not be held by the Department that both laws are in force. I think the construction would be erroneous; but the Department may hold that this provision which you are now about to adopt, provided you adopt it, as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, does not necessarily repeal the antecedent provision; and what I suggested was, that he had better say, in so many words, that the antecedent provision is hereby repealed.

Mr. WILSON. Let me suggest to the Senator that several provisions of the original bill are repealed, and some of them are modified by this bill; but the act stands in substance. Most of the provisions of this bill are to correct some portions of the original act. In the practical operation of the act it has been found necessary to make these changes; and I believe they are most generally concurred in by all who have examined the subject. Now, a simple section added to this bill, that "all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are repealed," I think would meet the Senator's idea.

Mr. JOHNSON. That would do.

Mr. CLARK. I think I can suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts and also to the Senator from Maryland what will accomplish the purpose of both; and that is an amendment which shall say that whenever a person has been drafted and furnished a substitute or paid $300 he shall be exempt from further draft until the enrollment is exhausted, not exceeding three years. I think the purpose of both would be accomplished if the amendment were modified in that way.

Mr. HOWE. I simply wish to put a question, and that is as to the effect of adopting the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, which is, as I understand it, to strike out what is proposed as the twenty-first section, and to adopt instead of it the language sent to the Chair. If that be done, will this portion of the bill then be any further amendable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. This section would not be, because the Senate would have agreed to it in the precise form in which it stands.

Mr. HOWE. I understand also that the proposition submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts now is no further amendable, being an amendment to an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not. The only method of reaching it would be to vote down this proposition for the purpose of introducing any other varying its terms.

Mr. HOWE. In that view of the case I wish to add one word to what I said the other day upon this amendment. I am still opposed to it upon the ground urged so forcibly the other day by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and which I endeavored to support. I think it is injurious to the whole body of the reserve; it is a wrong done to them to say that a drafted man, by the payment of a given sum of money, shall be exempt from any further liability to draft until the whole reserve has once been drawn. It increases the liability of any individual on the roll to be drafted just in proportion to the number of those who pay this money. That is one objection.

Besides that, there is another objection which I desired to meet and to obviate if I could, and thought I did or might obviate by the amendment which I proposed the other day, and which has been printed. I think the Legislature ought to provide some mode by which a person drafted may, upon some terms, or the payment of some sum of money, be exempted; because, as I stated the other day, we know that all men cannot with equal convenience leave their homes and their business to engage in this service. There is one class of men who can afford to do it at a given price. There is another class of men who cannot afford to do it for any sum of money which any one would think of paying, and there ought to be some provision, therefore, by which a person belonging to this latter class who is drafted may be exempted. As was stated here the other day, a man may have a large number of men and women in his employ, and the effect of taking him away from his business and putting him into the military service of the United States would be to discharge from active and profitable employment the whole number of men and women so employed by him. Therefore I thought it better for us to retain a provision which would enable a man who chose to do so to pay a prescribed sum to be exempted from the liability to serve under that draft.

I do not think, however, that that money ought to go into the Treasury. I think it ought to constitute a fund out of which to pay bounties to those who do choose, not to pay money, but to render service; and therefore if you make a draft of three hundred thousand men, and one hundred and fifty thousand of them choose to pay $300, or whatever the sum agreed upon may be, rather than to serve, and one hundred and fifty thousand of them prefer to take the money and serve, that they may be enabled to do it. The Government is not then impoverished; the military reserve is not then reduced; and the drafted man is benefited; he receives a bounty for going into the service. He does not get it out of the Treasury; the people are not impoverished; and the Army under this process may be made as large as you see fit to make it; for if under the first draft only one hundred and fifty thousand or one hundred thousand appear you can make another draft the next week or the next month, and continue to draw until you get the numbers in the field that you want to put there. You do not pay a bounty out of the Treasury, and yet you do furnish money out of the pockets of those who would rather pay money than serve, and it goes into the pockets of those who must serve because they cannot pay the money. It relieves the burden which personal service necessarily imposes upon the poor, upon that class who have no money to pay in order to avoid service; and it does not impoverish the Treasury nor the people; and because I would like to see that provision adopted, as well as for the reasons that were urged the other day, I cannot bring myself to support the amendment proposed now by the Senator from Massachusetts; for, as I understand from the Chair, if that amendment be adopted there will be no opportunity to offer any further amendment.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I desire to say one or two words, and only one or two, in regard to the bill that is before us. It strikes me that the whole tenor of the debate which has been indulged in proceeds on the supposition that this bill is virtually a revenue measure, that Senators expect it to raise money and not to raise men, and that they are trying their best now to apportion it in such wise that the tax of money shall fall most equitably in its operations. I do not see any justification for a conscription bill as a revenue measure. I think it is the most unequal and the most unjust system that can possibly be adopted for raising money to hire soldiers. It is raising a revenue for that purpose by chance, not by those measures that have been provided by the Constitution, and by those modes that have been uniformly adopted heretofore. To show that I do not speak without warrant in this thing, let me cite a fact: there has been already one draft under the bill containing this $300 exemption clause; and if I am correctly informed in regard to it, out of two hundred and ninety thousand drafted men, eleven thousand of those drafted have gone into the service. Now, I take occasion to say that any law which is passed for one object, and which, failing to attain that object, simply arrives at another object, is defective in its nature, is not such a law as we ought to pass here; and I think the idea of passing a law to get men to fill our Army which law in its operation out of a draft of two hundred and ninety thousand only secured eleven thousand, is fatally defective. Therefore I do not feel a great deal of solicitude about the features of this bill if that exemption clause is to be retained in it. It will amount to nothing more nor less than a revenue bill. It will simply, by lot, tax so many of our people so much each in order to enable the Government to hire substitutes.

My own belief is that the Government needs men and not money. I believe it is going to need them more in the future than it needs them in the present. I do not concur altogether with the sentiment that has been advanced on this floor in regard to the present attitude of affairs, and the safety with which we can look forward to those chances that lie before us. We have been engaged for three years in a war more gigantic than any ever known to us before. With each recurring spring we have looked to the certain termination of it by the next year; and yet with each recurring spring we have had to make new armies and have had to call for an additional force of men. I am not prepared to say that we shall not have to do so in the future. I know that we are doing so now; and yet in the presence of that demand, with the recognized certainty that you want many thousands of men, you are here enacting a law which will permit the men of the nation to stand back and hand you their dollars instead. I cannot call that a conscription law. You are doing more than that: you are striking a blow at the very principle which recruits our armies. If you come forward and say to this nation, "The crisis is such that we demand the personal service of our citizens; we demand their enrollment and their assignment wherever the nation shall deem their services best," you will appeal to the noblest sentiments in the human heart, and the appeal will not be in vain. But if, instead of that, you come forward and say to them, as you do substantially say to them here, "It matters not whether you enter the service or not; give us your $300 and go;" does that present the crisis? Do you not by your own action justify all the citizens of this Republic in saying, "If the Government only wants so much money, and does not need personal service, we will give it the money and stay at home." It strikes me in that light. I may be mistaken in regard to the operation of this draft; but with the light that is before me, and with the facts staring us in the face that, with that exemption clause contained in it, it has been a failure as a draft, I do not think we shall do justice to our position or to the exigencies of our country if we still retain that exemption clause in the law.

Now, sir, I have shown, or at least I have attempted to show, that this bill as it stands, if the $300 exemption clause is retained in it, will amount to neither more nor less than a revenue bill to furnish the Government with the money for securing recruits. I assume to say, therefore, that if that is the intent, as I believe it will be the practical operation of this bill, this is the most cumbersome measure, the most unjust and the most unequal mode of arriving at that result that could possibly be devised. It is not fair in its taxation; it will not be an equal burden on the country; and the Government can be supplied with funds in far better modes than the one proposed. The only justification that I have heard which strikes me with any force is that by this bill you make the Government the agent for procuring substitutes instead of the individuals who are drafted; in other words, that you empower the Government, by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, to employ substitutes, making the drafted persons pay their $300. That does not touch the question of the inequality of this as a tax or revenue measure; and furthermore, I think that if it is simply the object to make the Government the agent for procuring substitutes or procuring recruits for filling our armies and paying out this amount for so doing, it can be done far better by a simple bounty bill than by all this cumbersome machinery of enrollment and lottery. I shall therefore be compelled to vote against all amendments that look to the retention of that $300 exemption clause. If I am to vote for a conscription bill, I want one that shall be applied to the nation and that shall call for personal service and that shall effect the end for which it is designed. If I desire a revenue measure I wish it shaped as revenue measures usually are shaped. If the bounty system is to be retained, then let us make a bounty bill.

I simply desired, sir, to express the opinions I entertain and intend to hold on this subject, and to give some of the reasons that operated with the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs in urging that that $300 exemption clause should be stricken out, and that we should have in fact, as we have in name, a conscription bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will withdraw the amendment that is now before the Senate, offered by him, so that the question may be taken at once by the Senate, and the sense of the Senate obtained as to whether we will continue the commutation principle or not. He presents it now, in the manner in which it is before the Senate, in a complex and difficult form. In the first place, it is proposed by the committee of which he is the chairman to repeal the commutation clause, and the committee report an amendment to that end, to which the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the committee, moves an amendment, and practically says to the Senate, "If you strike out the commutation clause and are disposed to vote that way, you must accept this form of substitute that I propose;" and the Chair decides that that form being accepted and adopted, it is not subject to change or amendment. Why not let the Senate determine first whether this system of commutation shall be continued or not, and not embarrass us with arbitrarily presenting in lieu of it a particular form of amendment?

And right here, sir, I desire to make a suggestion as a matter of parliamentary propriety. I rose, you will remember, a few moments ago, ignorant of the rule that governed the action of the Senate, and asked for a division of the question; but I find that the difficulty occurs from this system of a committee reporting an amendment to an existing law and then reporting an amendment to their own amendment, which is a practice, in my opinion, "more honored in the breach than in the observance." I hope the Senator will withdraw his amendment, and let the sense of the Senate be taken on the question as to whether the system of commutation for money shall be retained or not.

Mr. HARRIS. I concur with the Senator from California in the suggestion that it would be better for the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw his amendment, and allow the question first to be taken upon the adoption of the section reported by the committee.

I, for one, am opposed to that section. I am in favor of the principle incorporated in the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, but I should be very glad to offer an amendment to that proposition before it is passed upon. As it stands now, the question is simply whether the Senate will take the proposition reported by the committee, or whether it will take the substitute proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will permit me, the form of the question in fact is this: The Committee on Military Affairs say to the Senate, "You have got to take just such a form of legislation on this whole subject as we propose, and unless you take that, you cannot take anything else." It is all wrong.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from California surely is very much mistaken. The Committee on Military Affairs instructed me to report the bill with this twenty-first section in it. I was opposed to that twenty-first section, and I so stated to the Senate. I therefore, as a member of the Senate, not as a member of the Military Committee, have proposed this amendment to the committee's amendment. I proposed it to meet an objection which was made by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and which has been made by several other Senators, that they were willing to retain the commutation clause provided the person paying the commutation should not be exempted for three years. I therefore proposed this modification.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to say a word right there?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. Cannot the Senator perceive that the mode proposed by him is obnoxious in the sense that has been stated, namely: he tells us that the repeal was objectionable to Senators, and they told him if he would agree to a certain form they would support it and vote for it. Then should not that have pointed out to the Senator the necessity of taking the sense of the Senate as to whether the commutation should be retained or not? That being determined, the Senator might accept the suggestions of other Senators, or present his own views in any form that he saw fit. But it is clear if the Senate should say by a majority vote that this system of commutation shall no longer exist, if they should say, "We do not want it," that that would be an end to the question of commutation altogether, and there would be no necessity of wasting time longer upon that subject.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that proposition precisely; but I think the Senator, if he will study the rules, will find that I, or any other member of the Senate, have a right to propose an amendment to this pending amendment. I made it, as I supposed, to represent the views of those who are in favor of retaining the $300 commutation clause; but the Senator from New York, who I thought held the same view the other day as presented by the Senator from Ohio, now desires to take a direct vote upon the proposition of the committee without amendment; and the Senator from California, whose views I do not know in regard to the main proposition of repealing the $300 commutation, desires to take a direct vote on the proposition of the committee. I am certainly willing to accommodate the Senators.

Mr. CONNESS. It is not an accommodation; but, with the Senator's leave, it is by that very mode that the Senator will ascertain how I shall vote upon the subject. In the mode proposed by him he cannot ascertain, because I shall be compelled to vote against his amendment in the form in which he presents it.

Mr. WILSON. I am willing to put it in a form to suit the Senator from California.

Mr. CONNESS. Oh, no; not for me.

Mr. WILSON. And now I will say finally, once for all, rather than labor longer in the Senate on this proposition, I will withdraw my amendment, and allow the vote to be taken on the amendment of the committee. Of course I shall vote against it; but I care very little as to what the result may be upon it. I have no doubt what the final vote of Congress will be on the subject, and I am very anxious that we shall dispose of the bill to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator withdraws his amendment to the amendment of the committee, and the question now is on the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let the amendment be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, to add the following as an additional section to the bill:

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved on the 3d day of March, 1863, as authorizes the discharge of persons drafted into the service of the United States under the authority of that act upon the payment of a sum of money not exceeding $300, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ANTHONY answered to his name.

Mr. NESMITH. Mr. President, when this proposition was originally before the Senate—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The call of the roll having commenced, and a Senator having responded, it is too late to debate the proposition. The Secretary will proceed with the call.

The result was then announced—yeas 12, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Grimes, Harlan, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nesmith, Rainey, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Canfield, Clark, Colman, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Pomeroy, Sainsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wilson—28.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now submit the amendment of which I gave notice the other day. It is to strike out section four of the bill after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That any person enrolled under the provisions of the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, or who may hereafter be so enrolled, may furnish at any time an acceptable substitute who is not liable to draft, and such person so furnishing a substitute shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute shall have been accepted.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That any person enrolled and drafted into the military service of the United States may furnish an acceptable substitute, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War. That if such substitute is not liable to draft, the person furnishing him shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute is not liable to draft, not exceeding the term for which he was drafted; and if such substitute is liable to draft, the name of the person furnishing him shall again be placed on the roll, and shall be liable to draft on future calls. And any person now in the military or naval service of the United States, not physically disqualified, who has served more than one year, and whose term of unexpired service shall not at the time of substitution exceed six months, may be employed as a substitute to serve in the troops of the State in which he enlisted; and if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procurement of a substitute, under the provisions of the act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall operate only to relieve such person from draft on that call, and his name shall be retained on the roll, and he shall be subject to draft on future calls, and the maximum of commutation under said act shall hereafter be $500 instead of $300.

Mr. WILSON. I will ask the Senator from Ohio why he desires to strike out the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. My amendment embodies all of the fourth section that is material, and it makes the phraseology better. It contains everything essential in that section, besides including some other matters.

Mr. WILSON. Does the Senator's amendment permit a person who has been enrolled, but who has not been drafted, to furnish a substitute?

Mr. SHERMAN. It does not.

Mr. WILSON. That is a provision of the fourth section, and it is regarded as a very important one.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection at all to that provision being retained. I did not suppose that any one who was simply enrolled would furnish a substitute. To avoid all question about it, I will offer my amendment as a new section, and then if the Senate so determine they can strike out or modify the fourth section of the bill afterwards.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The Senator from Ohio modifies his amendment by offering it as a new section.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to amend that amendment, but as I have not had it under consideration particularly, I do not know precisely where to insert my amendment, and perhaps if it meets the views of the Senator from Ohio who offered it, he will indicate the place. I quite agree with him in the measure which he proposes, to prevent us from exhausting the physical strength of the country; but I do not think a man who has once been drafted and who has paid his $300 should be drafted again until all others liable under the same draft have been drafted; and if the amendment could be so altered as to provide for that I should be inclined to support it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Ohio. I should like to know the reasons which have induced him to enlarge the price of commutation from $300 to $500. That amount of $300 was fixed, after very great consideration and deliberation, as about the right amount to accomplish the purpose we had in view. I am very much afraid if we raise it from $300 to $500 it will expose the law to greater attacks than those to which it was subjected before, on the ground of its being intended to let off those who are rich, as they call them, by the payment of money, and to compel those who are less able to pay to enter the service. I take it the object to be accomplished is twofold. We want to get men. That is the first thing; and therefore in fixing the commutation, if we fix one at all, we must not fix it so low that everybody can pay it, because then you may fail utterly to get men. Nor must you fix it so high that you put it out of the power of a certain class of the community, not rich, but still able to pay, who are unable for certain reasons to go into the service, to avail themselves of it. Now, $300 was fixed upon as about the right sum. If there are any good reasons for changing it, of course I shall not object; but it strikes me that the Senator will expose the new law to renewed attacks, it having once withstood the force of all that were made upon it, on the same ground on which the old one was attacked, and in reality he will get the sum higher than it ought to be. I merely suggest this to him. I am disposed to vote for his amendment pretty much as it stands with the exception of that change, and I suggest to him whether he had not better leave the amount as it is.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very indifferent in regard to the details of this proposition. My reason for inserting $500 is, that by experience $300 has proven not to be sufficient. The Secretary of War himself has offered a bounty of $402, showing that he deems $300 too small.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh no; he only offers $300 in addition to the $100 provided by law; and that is only paid to veterans.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true; but still $300 was not sufficient. Those who entered the service through the medium of the draft did not receive the $100 bounty. They received only the $300 commutation money, and that, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, was not sufficient to induce the enlistment of veterans, a class which above all others we desire again to enter the service, and whose services are most valuable to the Government. It will be perceived by the Senate that the amount is not fixed at $500, but that is merely made the maximum. The Secretary of War, if he deems $300 sufficient, may retain that sum. If he deems $400 necessary, he may demand that; but he cannot go beyond $500. That is the maximum. The minimum, as a matter of course, may be just so low as is necessary to get the substitute. There is a constant variation and fluctuation in the value of money, and that consideration must not be overlooked. Three hundred dollars now is not equivalent to more than $200 at the commencement of the war. We must guard against a possible fluctuation in money. We cannot make a given sum now the standard of value, because we do not know what may be the depreciation nor the inflation of paper money—the difference between gold and paper money. It is therefore difficult to fix a standard. I believe $300 is too small; and that was shown by the fact that so many of those drafted came forward and paid the $300 instead of hiring substitutes.

Now in regard to the other point, suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, he agrees to that portion of this amendment which provides that if one man is drafted and hires a substitute who is himself subject to draft, the drafted person shall again take his place on the roll subject to a future draft. Now is it right or proper to give to the payment of money a greater effect than you give to the hiring of a substitute? There is the question. The honorable Senator from Vermont entertains the same view of the question. That is the only difficulty with me. I do not care about the details, I simply wish to get the substance as near as possible; but it seems to me that we ought not to give to the payment of money a greater force than the hiring of a substitute who is himself subject to draft. I can see no hardship in it. If a man prefers to pay his money, let him take his place on the roll subject to future draft. What is the hardship? If he hires a man subject to draft, we all think it proper that he should go back and take the place of the substitute on the enrollment. Why should you give to the payment of money a greater force than the employment of a substitute? Under the operation of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island no man would hire a substitute subject to the draft. Why? Because, by paying a sum of money he could derive a greater advantage than he would by hiring a substitute; and therefore he would always pay the money rather than hire a substitute. That was the reason that induced me to insert this clause. I think the maximum ought to be $500, considering the depreciation of paper money, the inflation of prices, the abundance of money in this country, and the price of labor which enters into the elements of the price of a substitute. All these things must be considered. The ordinary wages of a common laborer now are fully fifty per cent. more than they were before. If $300 was a proper standard two years ago, it is not a proper standard now.

I merely make these suggestions. As a matter of course this amendment is open to amendment; and I offer it in this case for that purpose, so that if any amendments are offered they may be discussed and acted upon. I look upon this question of commutation or substitution as the most important feature of this bill. I think therefore we ought to consider it carefully, wisely, give to it full reflection, and then adopt and stand by it. As for the popular clamor that may be raised in regard to the commutation, we must meet that without fear, favor, or affection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator that, after all, whatever sum he fixes as the price of commutation would be very likely to be the one fixed upon by the Secretary of War; because men would hold themselves aloof very much from coming forward as substitutes, and from enlisting, unless the price was fixed precisely in that way. Three hundred dollars being fixed in the bill before, regulated very much the price of substitutes, and it was intended to regulate the price of substitutes. If you put in $500, that will be very likely to have the same effect. The Senator says, in relation to this change of the sum, that he merely fixes the maximum beyond which it shall not go; but my friend will recollect that when we fix a rate of interest in a loan bill, and say it shall not exceed so much, we are very apt to go to the maximum. People will not lend their money unless they can get the maximum interest.

It is likely, also, if we are to continue this system of bounties, that the sum thus fixed will become the standard by which we shall regulate the amount to be offered as bounties hereafter. You say that the bounties now offered and sanctioned by Congress are—what? The $100 fixed by the law originally and $300, which is fixed as the price of commutation. Then suppose we are to go on and have a difficulty about getting men, and the Government, or Congress, a part of the Government, is still to keep up this system of bounties, will not the increase be just the same, and the next offer be $600? My friend from Ohio and I have had the misfortune, if you please to call it so, to stand almost alone in our views with regard to this system of bounties and its operation upon the Treasury, and we found ourselves most decidedly overruled in every direction about it. It seems that the Treasury is to bear these heavy burdens. If it is, and if it is likely to be the standard hereafter, if every new call is to increase the amount to be fixed on, I should think we ought not to be in a hurry to fix that sum which would be very likely to be the next standard assumed in relation to it.

I merely suggest these things to him. I have really no very definite opinion on the subject, for I have not been able to give my mind to it. I am only looking at it, as far as I can, to guard against evils of which perhaps I am too apprehensive, and yet of which I am very apprehensive in the future.

Mr. ANTHONY. I propose to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "call," in the twenty-first line, the following words:

Provided, That no person who has been drafted and furnished a substitute or paid commutation as herein provided, shall again be liable to draft until the present enrollment shall be exhausted.

That, I think, meets the objection which the Senator from Ohio raised to making a distinction between furnishing a substitute and paying commutation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It ought to be limited as to time, as the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts was.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is limited by the words "until the present enrollment shall be exhausted."

Mr. WILSON. The limitation in my amendment was, "but such exemption shall not exceed the term for which the person shall have been drafted."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Otherwise the roll may not be exhausted in that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will mention in a word my objection to this proposed amendment. There is no justice in it, as between the United States and the drafted man. If the drafted man would go into the service, as he ought to do, the substitute would still stand upon the roll, and would be liable to draft at the next turn of the wheel. Now, if a drafted man chooses to hire a substitute thus subject to draft, why should he have a better place than the substitute would have had if this arrangement had not been made? It seems to me that justice between the United States and the drafted man requires that the drafted man should occupy the precise place, and no other, that the substitute employed by him held, or would have held if the drafted man had gone into the service, instead of hiring a substitute. I shall therefore vote against the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island to my amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will add to my amendment these words: "but such exemption shall not exceed the term for which such person shall have been drafted." I cannot see how this amendment is unfair toward the United States. It merely spreads the liability over a larger surface. It makes two men liable for a portion, instead of making one man liable for the whole time, and the United States will have just as many men if this amendment prevails as it will without it under the original proposition. The only difference is that the hardship is divided among a greater number of persons.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, which will be read from the desk.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment, in line twenty-one, after the word "call," to insert the following:

Provided, That no person who has been drafted and furnished a substitute or paid commutation as herein provided, shall again be liable to draft until the present enrollment shall be exhausted; but this exemption shall not exceed the term for which such person shall have been drafted.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to amend that amendment by striking out the word "five," in the twenty-second line, and inserting "four," so as to make the maximum of commutation $400.

Mr. HOWARD. If it be in order, I move to amend the amendment by striking out that last clause entirely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not now in order. The amendment of the Senator from New York is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will inquire if the amendment of the Senator from New York were adopted, and $400 substituted for $500, would the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan to strike out the clause entirely be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that it would.

Mr. JOHNSON. Suppose that amendment is rejected, then the proposition will stand at $500?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will so stand.

Mr. JOHNSON. Those who vote for $400 and think it should not be $300, will not be bound to vote for the amendment should the $400 be adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks they will not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask, if this amendment be adopted will it then be in order to strike out $400 after the Senate has inserted it, and insert $300?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no doubt, the question being taken on the largest amount first, that it could still be reduced.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I wish to state, at the request of my colleague, [Mr. WILLEY,] that he is detained from his seat by indisposition.

Mr. JOHNSON. I make the same statement in relation to my colleague, the Senator recently reelected from Maryland, [Mr. HICKS.] He is quite sick at his lodgings.

The result was then announced—yeas 31, nays 6; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Grimes, Harlan, Howe, Nesmith, Sherman, and Sumner—6.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the question recurred on the amendment as amended.

Mr. HOWARD. If it be in order, I will now move to strike out the clause itself; that is to say, the following words:

And the maximum of commutation under said act shall hereafter be $300 instead of $300.

I think that sum is entirely too high. In its operation, it seems to me there is danger of its defeating the very object which we have had in view in enacting a commutation at all, for it would disallow a very great number of men from escaping the military service as to whom it was the intention of Congress to give them the privilege, and it would work this effect in consequence of their want of means to raise the money. Besides that, sir, I confess I do not like this sudden alteration of a law which is so important in the public mind as the present one. The sudden transition from the $300 clause to a $500 clause would take the country by surprise, and disappoint the expectations—

Mr. COWAN. It is now $400. The $500 has just been stricken out.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, I would not increase it at all. I think $300 is as near the mark as we can conveniently fix it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan proposes to amend the amendment by striking out the last clause of the amendment in the following words:

And the maximum of commutation under said act shall hereafter be $400 instead of $300.

Mr. COWAN and Mr. HOWARD called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HALE. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Michigan how that will leave the bill in regard to the commutation, if this clause is stricken out?

Mr. HOWARD. This increases the commutation.

Mr. HALE. But suppose it is stricken out?

Mr. HOWARD. That will leave it at $300, as it has been since the act was passed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Hale, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Powell, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Doolittle, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, and Wilkinson—14.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. HOWE. I move now further to amend the bill by adding as an additional section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That all sums paid to the Government, or to any officer thereof, by persons drafted into the military service of the United States, by way of commutation for such services, shall constitute a fund which shall be equally distributed among the several persons who shall be drafted into and enter upon the same service under the same call of the President, one third of which shall be paid at the termination of each year's service: Provided, That any portion of such bounty remaining unpaid whenever any such drafted person shall die in the service, or shall be honorably discharged therefrom, shall then be paid in full to such discharged soldier, or to the legal representatives of such deceased soldier.

The Senate has already decided that it will not abolish all commutation; it has already decided that it will not compel a man who is drafted to either serve or employ a substitute; it has already decided that it will exempt a man from service on the payment of a given sum of money, whether that sum is sufficient to employ a substitute or not; and it has already decided that it will not require a man to pay more than $300. Now, I do not think that is just; I do not think we have a right to say, as we have said by the force of our votes, that we will allow a man in large business, deriving a large income from it, possessing, if you please, a large fortune, to be exempt from military service upon the payment of $300, when we say at the same time that that is not sufficient to hire a man to take his place. I was anxious to retain a provision allowing commutation for personal service, but I wanted to take care that the sum should be sufficient to secure substituted service, or that the person who could not avail himself of the commutation should be benefited by the payment of it. I still shall not object to the net result of the different votes we have taken if you allow the money which is raised from commutations to go into the pockets of those who go into the Army. They have to serve because they cannot pay the $300. You will still have taken care, since the name of the man who pays the money is still borne upon the roll, that the Army shall be filled up to its maximum, and therefore the drafted man is not injured by being compelled to serve in depleted ranks, which has been an injury we have inflicted upon him often heretofore. If you now provide that he shall have the benefit of the money which is paid for commutation, he has then no reason to say that he is injured by the payment of the commutation. On the other hand, he is benefited. The Government is not impoverished in any sense, because it does not come out of the Treasury. You lighten the burdens which would otherwise fall upon the shoulders of those upon whom these burdens sit heaviest, and who are deprived by adverse fortune of all pecuniary ability to escape these burdens. I want to vote on the amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 10, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Hond

ricks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Ramsey, Saulsbury, and Wilkinson—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Cowan, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wilson—26.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DIXON. I now offer the amendment which I proposed a few days since in regard to clergymen. It is to insert as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That all persons recognized as clergymen or ministers of religion by the ecclesiastical authority of the denomination or communion to which they belong, when called into the military service under this act, shall be regarded as non-combatants and employed as chaplains or in hospitals.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting:

That ministers of the gospel and members of religious denominations conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms may, when drafted into the military service, be considered non-combatants, and shall be assigned by the Secretary of War to duty in the hospitals or to the care of freedmen, or shall pay the sum of $300 to such person as the Secretary of War shall designate to receive it, to be applied to the benefit of the sick and wounded soldiers; and such drafted persons shall then be exempt from draft during the time for which they shall have been drafted.

Mr. HARLAN. I will inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if he will not accept, as a modification of his amendment, the addition of the following words after the word "arms" in the third line of his amendment:

And who are prohibited from doing so by the rules and articles of faith and practice of said religious denomination.

Mr. WILSON. I accept that modification.

Mr. SUMNER. Let it be read now as a whole.

The Secretary read, as follows:

That ministers of the gospel and members of religious denominations conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms, and who are prohibited from doing so by the rules and articles of faith and practice of said religious denomination, may, when drafted into the military service, be considered non-combatants, and shall be assigned by the Secretary of War to duty in the hospitals, or to the care of freedmen, or shall pay the sum of $300 to such person as the Secretary of War shall designate to receive it, to be applied to the benefit of the sick and wounded soldiers; and such drafted persons shall then be exempt from draft during the time for which they shall have been drafted.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am in favor of this amendment, but I think as it stands now it is liable to abuse. I think the persons claiming exemption on the grounds of religious conviction should make it appear before some tribunal or officer that their walk and conversation has been in accordance with their religious profession.

Mr. COWAN. That is a wide field.

Mr. ANTHONY. For instance, take the members of the Society of Friends. I think they ought to be exempted from military duty, but there are many young persons in the Society of Friends, who are in membership of the society, who have no objection at all to bearing arms and who do go into the military service. There are great many members of that society in the military service.

Mr. HARLAN. The amendment as it now stands meets the case the Senator from Rhode Island suggests precisely. It provides for the case of those who are conscientiously opposed to bearing arms and who are prohibited from doing so by the rules of the society of which they are members. If they are not conscientiously opposed to bearing arms, then, of course, they are not exempted, although they may be members of such a society. Throwing in these words "prohibited by the rules of the society" would prevent persons, I suppose, from making a pretense of that kind. The society to which the Senator has referred has had a rule of that kind, I have understood, ever since its foundation, a period of more than two hundred years.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, this amendment, if adopted, will not practically result, I think, in exempting clergymen, while it will exempt members of the Society of Friends. I confess that I, for one, am in favor of exempting the members of that society. I would not require them to do military duty when they have been brought up from their early childhood in opposition to bearing arms. But, sir, the amendment proposes not only that the minister or preacher who asks to be exempt shall be conscientiously opposed himself to bearing arms, but he must be prohibited from bearing arms by the articles of faith of his church. Under that provision there is no clergyman of the Episcopal church, no clergyman of the Methodist church, no clergyman of the Presbyterian church, or the Baptist church, or the Catholic church, and no Jewish teacher who, I apprehend, would be privileged from bearing arms in this contest, because there is no article in the faith of any religious denomination that I know of, except, perhaps, the Friends, which prevents the ministers or preachers from bearing arms. While I believe there is a large class of preachers in this country who ought to be made to go into this Army, and into the front ranks of it, to fight, and to fight until it is through—men who take occasion on the holy Sabbath, when we should suppose they would preach the gospel of their professed Master, "peace on earth and good will to men," to occupy the time allotted to religious purposes for preaching war and bloodshed—while I believe that that class of men ought to go into this war and to fight the battles of the country, yet there are scattered throughout this broad land hundreds, and I trust thousands, of peaceful, quiet Christian ministers who feel that they bear but one commission upon earth, that of an ambassador from Heaven to beseech men to be reconciled to their professed Master; and for the sake of exempting these men from participation in this or any other war, I would excuse the whole class of clergymen of whatever denomination. I would extend it also to men who are not ministers of the gospel technically—to teachers among the Jews—all religious teachers. If this amendment be adopted, unless a clergyman can show not only that he is conscientiously opposed to bearing arms, but also that the articles of faith of his church deprive him of the privilege of bearing arms, he is not exempt. I am for exempting the whole body of the clergy of all denominations.

Mr. WILSON. In order to meet the objection suggested by the Senator from Delaware, I propose to modify the amendment slightly, by striking out the word "and" in the first line and inserting "or;" so that it shall read, "ministers of the gospel, or members of religious denominations conscientiously opposed," &c.

Mr. DIXON. If that modification be made, I can accept the Senator's amendment, for I do not see that it changes the character of mine in the least. My proposition is that ministers of the gospel, when drafted, shall be employed in the hospitals, or as chaplains. I suppose, if so employed, they could commute. I take it they would have the privilege of saying whether they would serve in that capacity or pay $300. The only effect, therefore, of the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts is to make it certain that they may commute; they may not even perform this duty; if assigned to a chaplaincy, or to hospital service, they may pay the $300. That, I think, is right. I therefore, if it is in order, accept the Senator's amendment as a modification of my own.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may modify his amendment. The Senator from Connecticut modifies his amendment by accepting the amendment offered to it by the Senator from Massachusetts. The question then will be on the amendment as modified.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I am satisfied with the explanation of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN], and I hope that the amendment as modified will be adopted, although I should have preferred to have the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts put separately from the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, for I think it is rather stronger before the Senate. I had intended myself to offer a more comprehensive amendment for the relief of persons conscientiously unable to bear arms, and I had prepared one and given notice that I should offer it; but I am satisfied from the fate which that proposition met at the last session, and also from conversation with Senators, that we could hardly get it through, and therefore I assent to the most practical mode of accomplishing all the good that we can.

The object of this bill is to amend the defects which experience has found in the working of the enrollment act, and I submit to the Senate that the invasion of the rights of conscience is one of the most serious of those defects. There has not been a single man added to the Army who was worth the rations that he ate by the refusal to exempt persons conscientiously scrupulous as to bearing arms. I might tell you, Mr. President, the most piteous stories of the sufferings and persecutions of this class of people. I might tell you of many instances of moral heroism in men of the humblest pretensions, who believed and I believe that they were sustained by no arm of flesh in the sufferings which they endured for the sake of conscience. But I cannot show you and you cannot show me one single efficient man that has been added to the Army by the impressment of men conscientiously scrupulous against bearing arms.

I know the argument that every man who enjoys the protection of the Government is bound to render it defense in arms; but these men enjoy the protection of the Government, so far as that protection is enforced by arms, under compulsion, not voluntarily. They ask the protection of no laws which require the shedding of human blood. I think something should be conceded from the fact that the largest class of men affected by this provision have always borne their testimony against the great wrong, moral, social, and economical, which has produced this rebellion. They have not been slaveholders. Even in the slaveholding States they have not been slaveholders. As long ago, I think, as 1716 their Yearly Meetings all bore testimony against slavery, and even now this class of people in the rebel States are mostly Union men, and have suffered greatly for their attachment to the Union.

I have not ventured to offer the comprehensive amendment which I had intended to submit; but I hope that in the modified form in which it is now proposed the Senate will agree to the exemption.

Mr. TEN EYCK. One of the objects of the amendment is to relieve the religious Society of Friends from the burden of this bill, and the Senator from Rhode Island has stated very truly the difficulties to which members of that society have been heretofore subjected, and the persecutions, to adopt his language, that have been heaped upon them in regard to the performance of military service. If we intend to do them a favor and to relieve them from the consequences of this act, I respectfully submit that we must go further. We must not only relieve them from the draft, but from the liability of paying the commutation money, for I have always understood that Friends, as they call themselves, not only object to the performance of military service, but to the payment of any fine or commutation in lieu thereof; and many of them, even who were possessed of large estates, have lain for months in jail rather than violate what they understood to be a principle of their faith by paying a miserable fine of from one to five dollars for not discharging military duty under the militia system in the several States. I think it will not reach or answer the purpose that certain gentlemen have in view, to so amend this bill as to relieve them from the discharge of military service by the payment of the commutation. In all the petitions and in all the proceedings as published coming from this very large respectable class of citizens in the United States, I have seen the objection raised to both features of the bill, and, to adopt their language, they bear testimony as strongly against the payment of the money as they do against going into the field.

So, without stating how I shall vote myself upon this amendment, I suggest that if we design to respect their conscientious scruples and to relieve them on account of them, we must relieve them also from the payment of the commutation money. When this matter was before the Senate a year ago, I voted against relieving them.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the amendment, as modified, meets the case suggested by the Senator from New Jersey. This amendment relieves the party drafted in the case named from military duty entirely, and provides that he may serve in the hospitals, or that in lieu of this hospital service he may pay a sum of money to be applied for the relief of sick and wounded soldiers. The objection made by Friends to paying money has been to paying it as an equivalent for military service. They say, "We might as well bear arms as hire a man to bear arms in our stead." This amendment, if I understand it, relieves them from the performance of military duty entirely, but it provides that they shall perform duty in the hospitals, and then gives them the alternative of paying money rather than performing this hospital service.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would say, in justice to the scruples which the Friends have as to the payment of money, that I do not think they object to a military fine being collected from them by warrant of distress, as, I think, the lawyers call it, or by taxation. They do not pay them voluntarily, but they do not go to prison rather than have their property levied upon. But under the enrollment bill a man must either serve or pay $300 for the procuration of a substitute. They can see a difference, but no great difference in principle, between serving themselves and hiring somebody else to serve for them. The money which they pay is "for the procuration of substitutes." If the money could be appropriated to any hospital purposes, to any purpose towards which they can conscientiously contribute, they have no objection. These opinions may seem very absurd; I know they do, by Senators smiling around me; but they are opinions that have been entertained for two hundred years by as intelligent men as have ever spoken the English language, and men have borne every persecution that the old martyrs ever bore in defense of these principles—educated, intelligent men; and I think we ought to respect them.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator inform me whether they will not regard the requiring of them to go into the hospitals as an equivalent for military service, and whether that will not be regarded in the same light by them as the paying of $300 substitution money?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think they will consider that in the same light. I should prefer a different amendment; as I said, I prefer the amendment which I offered at the last session; but I have no hope of getting that through, and I think this will be an amelioration. It is not what I should like to have, but it is the best I see any chance of getting.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise, sir, not to occupy much time, but to take occasion to say that I am opposed to this amendment and all the modifications that have been made of it; and yet I suppose I have among my constituency many of the classes proposed to be exempted. The object of this act is to get soldiers. The purpose of the soldiery to be obtained is to preserve the institutions under which we live. The exemption proposed is more extensive, it occurs to me, than Senators take occasion to reflect sufficiently upon. It goes to ministers first, to all engaged in the performance of ministerial functions. That embraces a very large class indeed, a very numerous body in the United States. Next it goes to the bodies of religious congregations, and exempts persons who are conscientiously opposed to bearing arms.

Now, sir, what shall hinder the Unitarians, for instance, being exempted under the operation of this amendment if it shall prevail? The great man who was the founder of that form of faith, the immortal Channing, has written and produced perhaps the profoundest and ablest essay that was ever written by man, illustrating the horrors and the terrible character of war; and it is to be held that members of that body of religious Christians, so respectable as they, so elevated as they, do not believe in the doctrines and philosophies promulgated by their great leader, and shall not they go forth when drafted, but are they to claim to serve in the hospitals, or at any rate to be exempted from service in the field? It appears to me that you are providing very liberally for your hospitals under the operation of this amendment.

Now, let me say to the Senator from Rhode Island that the Society of Friends of which he has spoken, has claimed my attention to perhaps as great an extent as that of any other Senator upon this floor. I have happened fortunately to have access to and acquaintance of an intimate character with members of that denomination for twenty or more years past; and my respect for them, my regard for them, my estimation of them is certainly equal to that of any other Senator here. But, sir, I would in this great war take issue with that body upon the question of whether they should be exempted from paying this commutation; nay, sir, further, upon the question whether they should be exempted or can properly claim exemption as a matter of conscience from performing the part that is theirs, in my opinion, in this war. Why, sir, it is a Quaker's war. For two hundred years they have taught that slavery was the greatest evil that ever cursed the earth, and they have borne their universal testimony against it everywhere. They have gone to making up that sentiment that aggressed slavery as an institution barbarous in its character, and against the civilization of the world. They have, I say, been making up that opinion, and that aggression did take place under their fostering care and direction.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator from California allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator states that this is a Quaker's war, that they have borne their testimony against human slavery for two hundred years. Do I understand the Senator from California to say to the Senate and to the country that this is a war for the abolition of slavery?

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I knew that the Senator from Delaware would be brought into this debate by the line of remarks that I was about to make. The Senator from Delaware will find, before he sits very long in this Chamber with me, what my opinions upon that subject are. As I believe that the Senator from Delaware is pro-slavery, I desire him now to understand, although it is not pertinent to the question before the Senate, that I am anti-slavery, and upon a more proper occasion we will discuss that question in its relations to the war itself, but it is not pertinent here.

I asseverate, sir, again, that this is a Quaker's war. I mean that it is a war of moral forces against the institution of slavery. The South have said it. The gentlemen occupying the position of the Senator from Delaware have said it. They have undertaken to rear up a negro empire in the South upon the proposition that slavery was a great right, that you could not have morals and society without it, that it was essential to the existence of society; and in addition to that, necessarily a part of their proposition was to tear down our Government; otherwise they could not build up theirs. They have promulgated that doctrine. We accept it, sir. The loyal men of this country accept it in its complex form by saying, "You shall neither build up your negro empire for fostering and perpetuating this accursed institution"—does the Senator from Delaware hear the emphasis?—"nor shall you tear down this great empire established for freemen by the great fathers, to be preserved and perpetuated by us."

I say, sir, that no citizen, be he Jew or Gentile, be he Quaker or Catholic, be he what he may, to whatever religious persuasion he may belong, can perform a higher duty, nor, in my opinion, a more ennobling one, than to go to the field and to fight this great battle of civilization for the preservation of human liberty; and I am opposed to every amendment of this kind. There is a means proposed by which persons may become exempted, since the Senate have decided and passed upon that proposition; but I am opposed to this exemption for conscience' sake. I believe, as I live and exist, that the shortest and truest way to heaven is to strike a rebel wherever you can reach him. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Order!

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, a single word. A large number of clergymen have petitioned us for exemption. Some of them have put their reasons upon grounds that I think few of us can pay any great regard to. I suppose Senators care quite as much for the cause of Christianity in the world as other men, but I do not believe that Senators think it denounces a Christian to fight the battles of our country. The Quakers have been represented here by petition and by delegations. We received a delegation before the Military Committee, and heard their views. I believe that the Quakers have contributed as much of money, and I had almost said of men, to this war as any other portion of the community. The Senator from Rhode Island says he thinks they have in men.

Mr. ANTHONY. Taking the numbers of the society.

Mr. WILSON. I know that many Quakers, young men, have entered into this war with the same zeal that Nathaniel Greene entered into the war of the Revolution. In fact we have been told by gentlemen of these committees that they knew families where nearly all the young men had entered into the service. I asked those gentlemen what they said to them or did to them. They said they felt pretty kindly toward them and dealt rather gently. But, sir, the denomination as a class are conscientiously opposed to bearing arms. They have proved that by more than one hundred years of profession and practice. I have a strong objection to forcing a body of men whose lives prove that they are conscientiously opposed to bearing arms to do so. This provision, I think, relieves all who are conscientiously opposed to it, who belong to a religious denomination of which opposition to bearing arms is a part of the faith and creed. But we provide that they shall render service in the hospitals or pay money to be used for our sick and wounded soldiers. We need their money for that purpose, more than we can get, and we need all their personal service for that purpose. It will be a relief to them and will not weaken the strength or power of the country, for we want more men than we can get for the hospitals by any draft of this kind upon this class; and we need more money, and always shall while the war lasts, than they can furnish. It relieves them and does not injure or weaken the Government in any respect.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to say one word in reply to the Senator from California. He contends that this amendment would exempt the Unitarians as well as the Quakers, because the founder of the Unitarians was a peace man. That would be true if the Unitarians in that respect followed the precepts of their founder, but they certainly do not. The Unitarians as a class are not opposed to bearing arms, and this amendment would have no sort of relation to them. If Channing was a peace man, a greater than Channing, the Founder of our religion, has told us to pray for our enemies and to do good to those that spitefully use us.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me one moment? With the Senator's permission I will make the additional statement that not long since I had the pleasure of renewing my acquaintance by making a visit among some of my old-time Quaker friends, and I am very happy to be able to state, and I was very proud to hear it from them, that their chief anxiety in regard to my own course, knowing that I was a Senator, was lest I should in any manner whatsoever fail to urge on this war to a successful conclusion by the use of all the powers of the American people. I found them the truest, the noblest, and the sternest patriots that I have met in the country; and there was no begging for exemption, there was no disposition to avoid their part of the responsibility. I am fully free to admit that there are among them men who have taught themselves that it is a conscientious duty on their part to avoid a conflict of arms, but I would have them to reflect, and learn, and be taught by the age in which they live, by this period and time.

I admit what has been stated, for I know it to be true, that our armies have been very largely made up from members of the Society of Friends, though there have been here and there instances where they have totally objected to military service; but I am free to say, even if I should incur the opposition of every one of them in the United States, that if it were left to me to determine, I would not exempt them from the necessary obligations that I think are imposed upon them by this war. It is, as I said before, their war; it is the war of all men like them; it is the war of Christianity; it is the war of patriots; and there should be no sickly sentimentality while we are pressing it on. Every man who is able to bear arms owes all his services to the Government. Every man who has got a dollar's or a million of dollars' worth of property owes it all to the Government if the Government require it. The Government are entitled to the Senator's services and to mine in the field, and I am very free to say that they can get mine when it becomes my duty, and I propose no rule for another that I am not willing to come under myself; but I object in toto, in this great crisis, when the world is looking on, and when a large portion of the world is anxious to take part even against us, to any modification of our laws that in its direct tendency must tend to reduce the prospect of our immediate success.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it is proper to state the number of persons that would probably be affected by this exemption. It is supposed by those who are most familiar with the statistics of the society that under a draft for three hundred thousand men about a thousand members of the society would be drafted; and as half the quota has already been filled, the number who will be affected by this exemption is reduced to about five hundred. If still other States, as we have every reason to hope they will, shall fill up their quotas without drafting, the number will be proportionately diminished. The State of Indiana, which is one of the largest Quaker States in the Union, has filled its quota or will fill it; the New England States, where the Friends are somewhat numerous, have all filled or will fill their quotas without drafting; so of Ohio, where there are a great many; and Iowa always fills her quota without drafting, and there are many Friends there.

Mr. CONNESS. But you are passing a law to last as long as the war lasts.

Mr. ANTHONY. But we hope the same spirit that has filled the quota under this call will fill all others.

Mr. CONNESS. Hope is not a very good basis to conduct war on.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was about saying, when I gave way to the Senator from California, that we all believe in the divine inspiration of the words which I quoted; and we also all believe that it is perfectly proper, that it is our first duty, to carry on this war vigorously; we believe in that path to heaven which the Senator from California marked out; but I do not think he or I (I know I could not) would undertake to stand up here and reconcile the two. I believe them both, but I cannot reconcile the two together; and I wish to manifest a respect for the consciences of those who cannot reconcile them and will not undertake to do so.

Mr. CONNESS. I think more of the country than I do of their consciences.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I hope the proposition of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] will be adopted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will my honorable friend allow me to suggest a form of words that I think will express the idea at which gentlemen aim rather more definitely than it is expressed in the pending amendment, before he goes on with his speech?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I do not propose to make a speech, but merely to make a suggestion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I propose to have the amendment read thus:

"That all ministers of religious denominations in good standing, and acting as such, and all members of religious denominations in good standing as such, by the articles of faith and practice of which denomination the bearing of arms in war is forbidden, and who shall by oath or affirmation declare that he is conscientiously opposed to bearing arms in war;" &c.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have had some dealings with the Quakers, and I desire to say, for the edification of the Senator from California, that it is perfectly ridiculous to attempt to force a Quaker into the ranks of the Army. It cannot be done, or if you should succeed in doing it, he would be worthless as a soldier. Besides, the attempt to collect money from the Quakers in lieu of military service will cost the Government ten dollars where they obtain one, if they get it at all. It is a losing business to attempt to collect money from Quakers in lieu of military service. But if you adopt the proposition of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN,] giving them the privilege of serving in hospitals, and permitting them to pay their money in lieu of hospital service, they will promptly and cheerfully come forward and pay that money, their conscientious scruples not being violated by such payment.

Mr. POWELL. I had drawn an amendment which I intended to propose to the ninth section of this bill, and as that amendment expresses my views on the subject, though it is not now in order to offer it, I will read it for the information of the Senate. I would add to that section these words:

That ministers of the gospel, who have no secular pursuit, and who have not an estate or income sufficient to support themselves and their families, and who devote themselves exclusively to the ministry, shall be exempt.

That, in my judgment, is as far as we ought to go in this matter. The Senate has determined by a vote to retain the commutation clause. This amendment, which I shall propose at the proper time, if none other be adopted on this subject, exempts all ministers who devote themselves exclusively to the ministry, and who do not follow any secular or outside pursuit, and who have not an estate sufficient to support themselves and their families. That would exclude from the exemption those who have sufficient means to pay the commutation.

When the conscription bill was originally passed, and while it was under consideration, I was in favor of exempting clergymen, and I was in favor of exempting Friends; but I cannot understand the subtle logic of gentlemen who seem to think that if you compel a Friend to pay $300 commutation money in lieu of hospital service he can do it conscientiously when he cannot pay the money in lieu of military service. The hospital service is just as much an attendant upon war as any other service connected with the Army. You frequently have to detail soldiers to attend to your sick and wounded. Assigning them to hospital service and to military service is in effect the same. I would put the Friends in the same status and upon the same principle as clergymen in the amendment I shall propose. How a man can conscientiously pay the taxes that the Government imposes for the purpose of raising men and paying them and buying munitions of war, when he cannot conscientiously pay the commutation money, is a matter that I cannot well comprehend. I cannot see any difference. If a man cannot conscientiously go to war, and cannot conscientiously give money to carry on war, how can he conscientiously pay the taxes that the Government imposes for the purpose of carrying on the war? Why, sir, if a man can conscientiously pay the taxes, he can just as conscientiously pay commutation money. As the law now stands, a man can exempt himself from military duty by paying commutation money. That is but a form of taxation for the purpose of getting soldiers into your Army. The money goes to hire substitutes or to pay bounties. So the money that is raised by taxation is taken out of your Treasury for the purpose of paying bounties to soldiers and paying them their monthly stipend or wages. Where is the difference? There is none.

I do not think it is right to enlist in our armies ministers of the gospel, who have no secular pursuit, and who devote themselves exclusively to the ministry. All such persons, in my judgment, should be exempt. Neither do I think it right to force those to fight who are conscientiously opposed to it; but as you have retained the commutation feature, if they are not in favor of fighting they can pay their money like any body else. If the amendment which I intend to propose shall prevail, all those who are ministers of the gospel and who are not able to pay, will not be subject to draft. I shall vote against the amendment now proposed, hoping to defeat that and then to have the amendment which I intend to offer hereafter ingrafted on the bill. If it were now in order to do so, I would move it as a substitute for the pending amendment; but as that is not now in order, I shall have to abide my time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am sorry that the Senator is degenerating so, for I believe that at the last session he offered a more comprehensive amendment than this.

Mr. POWELL. Not more comprehensive, but an amendment exempting those who had conscientious scruples. I do not wish to force them to fight now.

Mr. ANTHONY. It may not have been more comprehensive as to the persons, but it was more comprehensive in its exemptions.

Mr. POWELL. I was opposed then to ministers of the gospel being compelled to fight. I am now; but I could not prevent it. I tested the sense of the Senate both on the Friends and on the clergymen, and I was defeated; and hence I have drawn this amendment to exempt such clergymen as devote themselves exclusively to the ministry, and have no secular pursuit and no estate the income of which is sufficient to support themselves and their families. This is the best I think I can do for them.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. In reply to the Senator from Kentucky, I will say that I think there is a distinction between military service in the field and hospital service. The one is to take life and the other to preserve life, as broad a distinction as can be. They are the antipodes of each other; the one to destroy life and the other to preserve life. Nor is the effort to preserve life confined to our own soldiers. The hospital servant administers not only to the wants of our own, but to the soldiers of the enemy. There is no comparison between the two species of service.

Mr. GRIMES. Is it possible to have a division of this question, so that we can vote on the Quakers separate from the preachers?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not examined the amendment carefully; but if it contains more than one proposition it can be divided into as many questions as there are distinct propositions.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire a vote on the propositions separate and distinct from each other. I should vote for the exclusion of one perhaps, and not for the exclusion of the other.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would suggest that the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his amendment for the present, and let us take the vote on the preachers first, and then he can renew the other as to persons conscientiously unable to bear arms.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa will designate what his own division is, and then the Chair will decide whether it is in order. The impression of the Chair hastily is, that you cannot make two distinct propositions of this amendment which would stand appropriately distinct by themselves.

Mr. HARLAN. I will suggest to my colleague that he can reach the object he intends by moving to strike out the words "ministers of the gospel."

Mr. GRIMES. Can that motion be made?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to strike out the words "ministers of the gospel."

Mr. BUCKALEW. Let the amendment be read as it now stands.

The Secretary read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That ministers of the gospel, or members of religious denominations conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms, and who are prohibited from doing so by the rules and articles of faith and practice of said religious denomination, may when drafted into the military service be considered non-combatants, and shall be assigned by the Secretary of War to duty in the hospitals, or to the care of freedmen, or shall pay the sum of $300 to such person as the Secretary of War shall designate to receive it, to be applied to the benefit of the sick and wounded soldiers, and such drafted persons shall then be exempt from draft during the time for which they shall have been drafted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa will also include the word "or" in his motion to strike out, to meet the view which he has.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on striking out the words "ministers of the gospel, or."

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand that that is in order now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. SUMNER. The case, as I understand it, is this: the Senator from Connecticut moved an amendment to the bill, to which my colleague moved an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Connecticut has accepted it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that it has already been accepted as a modification, and it now simply stands before the Senate as a distinct amendment; and it is, therefore, open to amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would suggest to the Senator from Iowa that he ought to propose to strike out the word "may" and to substitute the word "shall." As it reads now, it only gives to the Department the power to consider persons in the predicament which the amendment assumes, to be non-combatants. I propose to strike out the word "may" before the words "when drafted," and to insert "shall."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That can be done afterwards.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] to strike out the words, "ministers of the gospel, or."

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish this division could be made in some other way, so that we might vote affirmatively and not negatively upon the proposition. I do not wish to vote against including ministers in the section; and yet I fear that if that exemption is in it will weaken the remaining part of the amendment. I want a vote upon each separately, without voting negatively on either. I think if the Senator from Iowa would modify his amendment so as to leave out the portion now moved to be stricken out, he could afterwards move to make the same provision for the clergymen if the other proposition were adopted. I think the Quakers are a little stronger than the ministers, and I want to take a vote on them separately. I do not want to vote against the ministers. I want to vote for both.

Mr. GRIMES. I may be mistaken in my construction of the phraseology; but as I understand it, the qualifications that follow the second line of the amendment relate only to the Friends who have conscientious scruples.

Mr. CLARK and Mr. JOHNSON. No.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Massachusetts, who drafted it, says it is so, and that is pretty good authority; and I think myself that is the proper construction to be given to it. If that be so, the amendment, as it now stands, exempts all ministers of the gospel. It does not say "ordained ministers;" it does not require that they shall have charge of a parish; but anybody who carries in his pocket a license to preach is exempt.

Mr. DIXON. Let me suggest that if that is the difficulty, the Senator should propose an amendment to remedy that defect.

Mr. GRIMES. If I were anxious to exclude the ministers from being compelled to bear arms, perhaps I would propose the amendment; but I am not anxious to do it; I am in favor of making them fight or pay.

Mr. DIXON. They do now by this amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I am in favor of putting them upon exactly the same platform upon which we put men of any other profession in the country. I know perfectly well that they can all be exempted now under the general provisions of the bill by the payment of $300. If there is any clergyman whose services are worth to his parish more than $300, his parish will buy off his military services and keep him in charge of the parish.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. If they will not do it, he ought to be put into the service.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes. If we had stricken out the $300 clause I am not prepared to say that I would not go with the Senator from Connecticut to exempt the clergymen; but we have retained that clause, and it seems that it is to remain as a part of the settled policy of the Government that any man's military service can be bought off for $300. Now, I say there is no reason in the world why a clergyman should be exempted under the provisions of this bill, if we pass it into a law, that does not apply to a great many other classes of citizens in the country; and I want a distinct vote on that proposition.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask for the yeas and nays on excluding preachers.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARLAN. I will vote for the amendment proposed by my colleague, because I consider the words surplusage. I suppose there is no minister of the gospel who is not a member of the religious society for which he serves, and hence I consider the words perfectly useless and am in favor of striking them out.

Mr. DIXON. One objection of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] to this proposition is that it is too broad, that it includes too many, that it applies to all ministers of the gospel, without reference to the fact whether they are employed as such or whether they are recognized as such by any ecclesiastical authority. Now, I wish to inquire whether it is in order at this stage to amend that clause?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in order. The pending amendment is an amendment to an amendment, and therefore a further amendment is not now in order.

Mr. COLLAMER. Is it not in order to move an amendment to the words which it is proposed to strike out?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not, because that would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not speak of a proposition to amend the amendment now under consideration, but to amend the words which it is proposed to strike out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And the pending amendment is to strike out the very words which it is proposed to amend.

Mr. DIXON. This is an original proposition of the Senator from Iowa to strike out certain words. That motion has not been agreed to, and I wish to ask the Chair whether those words thus proposed to be stricken out are not amendable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. DIXON. Then I hope the Senator will withdraw his amendment for the purpose of allowing me to amend the first clause.

Mr. GRIMES. Very well, sir; I am willing to give the Senator from Connecticut an opportunity to amend the proposition, although I am unalterably opposed to any amendment that he may propose, and shall vote against it. I withdraw my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays having been ordered, it requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow the Senator from Iowa to withdraw his amendment. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Connecticut can now propose an amendment.

Mr. DIXON. I propose it in the form in which I first proposed it before accepting the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. I move to strike out the words "ministers of the gospel, or," and insert, "all persons recognized as ministers of religion by the ecclesiastical authority of the denomination or communion to which they belong, or."

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to inquire, as a question of order, whether, if these words are put in, they can be stricken out with the other amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut proposes to strike out the identical words which the Senator from Iowa moved to strike out, and to insert other words. If the other words shall be inserted, the same words having been stricken out that the Senator from Iowa moved to strike out, they could not again be replaced.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I trust the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will not prevail. Now let me tell the Senate a case that occurs in my own State. There is a religious society known there as the Amana Society; they believe in the present inspiration of their own members. There is a large colony of them settled also in Erie county in the State of New York. Every member of that denomination is a preacher, so that the provisions of this amendment would exempt every one of that large class of people; and yet they are among the very wealthiest persons in the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the Senator believe that that class would very much increase if this amendment should be made? [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIMES. I have no doubt it would. There is no telling to what abuse the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut might be carried if it should be enacted. Now, I think there is no call from the clergy of this country for this exemption. I know that the bishops of some of the Episcopal dioceses, for one cause or another, have petitioned in behalf of themselves and the pastors in their charge; but they embrace but a small fraction of the clergy of the country; and, as was well said by my colleague the other day, the clergy generally throughout the Northwest, where I live, have been grateful to Congress because in the passage of the enrollment bill they recognized their manhood and required them all to perform military duty in this hour of peril to the nation; and they have congratulated themselves in their ministerial conventions and associations that they had been recognized as men and as citizens who were willing to do and die in behalf of the country. There has been no general call from the clergy for this exemption, and I believe there has not been a single petition sent up here by the flocks of these Episcopal bishops and clergy. I have not had my attention, at any rate, called to a single petition that has been sent here by the laymen. Then, this proposition being without any call from any respectable portion (I mean in point of numbers) of the clergy of the country, it is wholly uncalled-for for us now to undertake to exempt this class of our fellow-citizens.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, as to the question whether this is called for by the clergy themselves, I will state that I have presented petitions from the bishops, I think, of every diocese except two in the loyal States, asking, not for entire exemption, for that they do not request, but asking that if drafted they may be employed as chaplains or in hospital service. They have not asked for entire exemption. There is no petition here that I know of for entire exemption.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Connecticut: I was in his State a few days ago, and I talked with some of the Episcopalian preachers; they do not ask service in the hospitals if we retain the $300 clause. In case we repeal the $300 clause, they ask that they may be employed in hospitals if drafted. I have their printed petition here. So far as the church that I belong to is concerned, we want no exemptions. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIXON. The Senator has not stated it with entire accuracy. He spoke of the probability of the repeal of the commutation; and in view of that, supposing they are to be forced into the service, they then say they wish to be employed as chaplains or in hospitals.

Then, Mr. President, as to the question whether other denominations have made application, I have presented several petitions from ministers and from laymen of the Lutheran church in the State of New York. I mention that fact merely to show that the Senator from Iowa is mistaken on this subject. But, Mr. President, the Senator speaks of a sect in his own State, all of whom claim to be ministers, and who under this clause would be exempt. What benefit would they receive? Suppose this is adopted, what can they claim? They can claim to be employed in hospitals or as chaplains by the Secretary of War, or they can pay the $300. That is all the exemption. As the law now stands, they can pay $300. The present law is not altered in the slightest degree by the last part of the proposition. They can, if they see fit not to act at all, pay the $300 and be entirely exempt; but our provision is that if they see fit to act they shall not be called into the field, but shall act in hospitals and as chaplains. If the Senator supposes there is any danger that the class of people to whom he refers will claim in great numbers to be employed as chaplains and in hospitals, that may be somewhat of an objection to the proposition. I do not believe that there is any danger of a great number of people like those mentioned by him claiming that kind of exemption. It seems to me that that cannot be an evil which we ought to be very careful to avoid, for I do not think it can happen.

Now, sir, all that is proposed by the amendment under consideration is that if you draft ministers of the gospel, those acknowledged to be such by the denomination or communion to which they belong, they shall, if they see fit to go into the service, be employed as chaplains or in hospitals. They of course can be exempted, as everybody can. Whether you include it in this clause or not, they can be entirely exempted. You have already exempted them on the same grounds as others. We propose now to say that if they see fit to serve and choose to serve, they shall serve in this capacity.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to an amendment which I think expresses more definitely what I believe is the view of the Senate, if they are disposed to make any exemption at all: "first, that ministers of religious denominations in good standing, and acting as such, who may desire?"

Mr. HARLAN. I will inquire from the Senator from Wisconsin how he proposes to show the character of the standing of a minister of a religious society.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. How do we show that a man is under forty-five years of age? It is a fact.

Mr. HARLAN. Do I understand that all those over forty-five years of age are to be regarded as in good standing? How is the military board to ascertain the fact of the relative standing of men in a religious society?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I propose that ministers who are in good standing with their religious denomination, acting as ministers, religious teachers of the denomination, shall be exempt upon the conditions which are specified here: they shall not be compelled to take a musket and go into the field against their religious convictions. If they desire it, they may go into hospital service, or some other service under the direction of the Secretary of War. My proposition is, further, that "all members of religious denominations in good standing as such, by the articles of faith and practice of which denominations the bearing of arms in war is forbidden, and who shall by oath or affirmation declare that they are conscientiously opposed to bearing arms in war, shall, when drafted into the military service, be considered non-combatants," &c.

Gentlemen may smile when the question is raised as to the exemption of those men who from conscientious religious convictions cannot take arms in their hands and go upon the bloody field of conflict; but they do not understand or they certainly overlook that element in human nature, stronger than all others, which will take men to the dungeon or to the cross for their religious convictions. It is true that in the bill as it stands now before the Senate a commutation clause is preserved. Any person may pay his $300 by way of commutation and be exempted from this service; and therefore, whatever may be done with this proposition, it will not operate so hard upon the consciences of men, because they can submit to have this fine or sum collected of them for not going into the service. But we desire not only to enact a law which shall bring men into the field, but we are desirous to enact it in such form that it shall comport with the feeling, the sentiments, the religious convictions of the country, if you please, so that it can have strength and be maintained at home and among the people. And when it makes no practical difference to the Government, if we can say that if a Quaker, if you please, is drafted into the service he may take his choice either to go into the hospitals as a non-combatant or into some service where he can take care of the sick and wounded, or that his money which he commutes for that service shall be employed for taking care of the sick and the wounded, we make this inscription bill palatable to a very considerable class of our population. But, sir, to force them against this religious conviction is what the Government ought not to undertake.

What I propose, Mr. President, in short, is this: that those teachers of religious denominations who are their ministers in good standing, acting as ministers of the gospel, in actual service and duty as such, shall not be put into the ranks as combatants; and further, instead of compelling members of religious denominations by whose faith and creed it is regarded as a sin against God to bear arms even in self-defense, to go into the ranks to do military service, they may be employed as non-combatants in hospitals or elsewhere, or they may commute, and the money which they pay shall go to taking care of the sick and wounded soldiers. Gentlemen say this makes no difference; they are just as much supporting the war in this way as if they paid the money directly to procure a substitute and place him in the field with arms in his hands. Perhaps you think so; perhaps I think so; but they do not; they draw a distinction; and in legislation we must regard as facts the prejudices and the religious convictions of a people. They are facts, important facts; facts that are not to be disregarded by any wise legislator in my opinion, and therefore, so far as I am concerned, I would conform our legislation in such a manner that while it does equal service to the Government it does not trample upon these religious convictions.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRIMES. I now renew the motion I made a little while ago to strike out the words "ministers of the gospel, or."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to say one word to explain my vote. I am in favor of the amendment as it stands; but as a proposition very similar to this has already been voted down, and I think the remaining part of the amendment is stronger without it, I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Iowa, and then I shall vote to put this matter in its proper place in the bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wilkinson—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Dixon, Doolittle, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Saulsbury, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wilson—10.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of it as it has been amended.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That members of religious denominations conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms, and who are prohibited from doing so by the rules and articles of faith and practice of such religious denominations, may, when drafted into the military service, be considered non-combatants, and shall be assigned by the Secretary of War to duty in the hospitals or to the care of freedmen, and shall pay the sum of $300 to such person as the Secretary of War shall designate to receive it, to be applied to the benefit of the sick and wounded soldiers; and such drafted person shall then be exempt from draft during the time for which they shall have been drafted.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to strike out the word "may," in the first part of the amendment, where it occurs, and insert the word "shall."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In order to make the amendment more clear I will move to insert after the word "denomination" in the second line the words, "who shall by oath or affirmation declare that they are;" so that it will read:

That members of religious denominations who shall by oath or affirmation declare that they are conscientiously opposed to bearing arms; &c.

I want those words in because I think they will make it much easier to administer the law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the whole of it read. I think, as it stands now, it is very imperfect. Will the Secretary read it again?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator ask for the reading of the amendment as it would read if the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to it were adopted?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

That members of religious denominations who shall by oath or affirmation declare that they are conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms, and who are prohibited from doing so by the rules and articles of faith and practice of said religious denominations, shall, when drafted into the military service, be considered non-combatants, and shall be assigned by the Secretary of War to duty in the hospitals; &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is sufficient.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas twenty-four, nays not counted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FOOT. Before that question is put, I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania who makes this motion to withdraw it, in order to allow me to interpose a motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. FOOT. Then I make my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WILSON. I think we had better sit here and finish this bill to-day. If we do that, then I shall be willing to agree to this motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania now moves an adjournment.

The motion was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the pending amendment as amended.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. Is that proposition still open to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. DAVIS. After the last class who are exempted by the words of the amendment, I will move to add the word "Shakers."

Mr. GRIMES. They come within the amendment now.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky insist on his amendment to the amendment?

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1863.

NEW SERIES.....No. 14.

Mr. DAVIS. Gentlemen assure me that they are comprehended by the language of the amendment, and if that is so I will not press it.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Quakers are not mentioned in terms, either, but they are included.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wilson—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Morgan, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wilkinson—12.

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to move an amendment in the nineteenth section. I move to amend that section in the fifteenth line by inserting after the word "recovered" the words, "upon information or indictment," and in line sixteen, after the word "jurisdiction," to strike out the words, "in an action of debt;" so that the clause will read:

And any agent or attorney who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any greater compensation for his services under this act, and any physician or surgeon who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any compensation for furnishing said certificates of disability, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding $300, to be recovered upon information or indictment before any court of competent jurisdiction, for the use of any informer who may sue for the same in the name of the United States; &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I have one more verbal amendment. It is in line seventeen of the same section, after the word "may," to strike out the word "sue" and insert the words "prosecute for," so as to give it the features and character of a criminal prosecution.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the fourteenth section of the act hereby amended shall be amended so as to read as follows: That all drafted persons shall, on arriving at the rendezvous, be carefully inspected by the surgeon of the board, who shall truly report to the board the physical condition of each one; and all persons drafted and claiming exemption from military duty under the second section of said act shall present such claims to the board of enrollment, which board shall be governed in making their decision by the rules prescribed by the Provost Marshal General under section six of this act.

The change contemplated by this amendment consists in requiring boards of enrollment to be governed by the regulations prescribed by the Provost Marshal General in exempting drafted persons for disability. It appears by the report of the Provost Marshal General that these boards of enrollment have sometimes acted upon their own responsibility, and have exempted persons for disabilities which were not embraced within the rules prescribed by the Department. I want to confine them to the rules prescribed by the Department to govern them in those cases.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer another amendment, to insert at the end of the third line of the sixteenth section the following words:

Unless it shall satisfactorily appear to the board of enrollment that such party is absent from the country, or unable to make such oath or affirmation.

So that it will read:

That all claims to exemption shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the party claiming exemption to the truth of the facts stated, unless it shall satisfactorily appear to the board of enrollment that such person is absent from the country, or unable to make such oath or affirmation; &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move further to amend the bill, in the tenth section, by inserting after the word "draft," in the fifteenth line, the words:

And who have been in such service for the term of two years during the present war and been honorably discharged therefrom.

So that it will read:

That the following persons be, and they are hereby, excepted and exempted from the provisions of this act, and shall not be liable to military duty under the same, to wit:

such as are rejected as physically or mentally unfit for the service, the Vice President of the United States, the judges of the various courts of the United States, the heads of the various Executive Departments of the Government, the Governors of the several States, and all persons actually in the military or naval service of the United States at the time of draft, and who have been in such service for the term of two years during the present war and been honorably discharged therefrom; and no persons but such as are herein excepted shall be exempt.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I have another amendment, to insert as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That any person not liable to be enrolled or drafted into the military service of the United States may volunteer and then furnish an acceptable substitute and be relieved from performing duty in person, either upon a call for volunteers or when a draft is ordered.

Mr. President, any one who is drafted may furnish another person as a substitute to go into the Army for him; but I have found, during the progress of this war, that there have been persons who are not liable to be drafted and not liable to be enrolled, who desire to volunteer for the name or pride of the thing and then furnish a substitute. I know an instance in my own city, where perhaps the most influential business man in the city, a man who is in the condition of those mentioned by the Senator from Ohio the other day, who had hundreds of persons in his employ, who was conducting a large establishment for the manufacture of guns for the Government, desired to volunteer, but was told that if he did he must go. There are other persons of that class who desire first to volunteer and then furnish a substitute. This provision may secure some soldiers to the Government. It may not operate very extensively, but it is desirable perhaps to adopt it if it secures a few.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire now to call up the amendment which I proposed a day or two since to the eleventh section. It is to strike out all of that section after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That section third of the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and so much of section ten of said act as provides for the separate enrollment of each class, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and it shall be the duty of the board of enrollment of each district to consolidate the two classes mentioned in the third section of said act.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That the national forces of the United States not now in the military service, enrolled under this act, shall be divided into two classes; the first of which shall comprise all persons subject to do military duty between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, and who are unmarried; the second class shall comprise all other persons subject to do military duty; and the persons of the second class shall not, in any district, be called into the service of the United States until those of the first class shall have been called.

I presented this amendment to the Senate, and it was voted down when the other enrollment bill was before the body. I think it is right. In the language of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] I think it will "popularize" the bill to some extent. It cannot impair the efficiency of the measure. I do not intend now to discuss it. If it is the pleasure of the Senate, I should like to have the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As there may be some Senators present who were not present when this amendment was before the body on a previous day, I will say it is simply this: that the military force shall be divided into two classes, married and unmarried, and that the unmarried men subject to do military duty shall be drafted before there shall be a draft of the married men. It is suggested by a Senator near me that it might require a reenrollment. In reply, I will say that the present enrollment shows who are married and who are unmarried, and there will be no practical difficulty and no delay consequent upon the adoption of this measure.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Collamer, Davis, Doolittle, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Powell, Saulsbury, and Sumner—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—29.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I laid an amendment on the table some days since, which I desire now to offer. It is to insert as an additional section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That in every case where heretofore any person has agreed to join, and has in fact joined, or may hereafter join, the military service of the United States, and has been received into the said service by any military officer thereof, the person so joining and received into such service shall, for all purposes whatever, be deemed to have been regularly mustered into said service in the position of officer, non-commissioned officer, or private, in which he may have served, notwithstanding he may not have been mustered in according to law and the regulations of the War Department.

I will say a single word in support of this proposition. There was a regiment raised in my State that was in two battles before it was mustered into service. A portion of the regiment was killed and a very considerable portion of them wounded; several of them mutilated, losing arms and legs. It was not the fault of these men that they were not mustered in. They were ordered to a rendezvous to be mustered in on a particular day. They were marched there, and the process of mustering in continued about a day. They were then ordered to a point called Cynthiana, in the State of Kentucky, and there they engaged in a very bloody battle, for the number of soldiers engaged, and a good many of them were killed or wounded. In a few days afterwards they were ordered on another expedition toward Richmond, in that State, and there they entered into two other battles, one at a place called the Big Hill, and the other at the little town of Richmond, in which the regiment again suffered very severely. The consequence of these series of battles was that a good many of them were killed, and a good many of them wounded, and some of them permanently disabled. One of them was in my office a few days before I left for this city, who had lost his right arm. I think there can be no objection to this amendment. I offered this proposition at the last session several times as a separate bill, and I could not get it to receive the favorable consideration of the Senate. I offered to attach it to several bills; and to put it into good company, but not better company than it was itself, and in that form I could not get it through the last Congress. I trust the Senate will now be disposed to accept the proposition as an additional section to the bill.

Mr. WILSON. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky has no concern with an amendment of the enrollment act, and this bill, so far, only relates to that act. I certainly do not oppose the principle embodied in the amendment moved by the Senator from Kentucky, but it is not germane to this subject. I hope, therefore, it will not be pressed, or if pressed that it will not be put upon this bill. We shall have one or two bills up within a few days on which the amendment may more fully be moved, and I hope that it will not now be put upon this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I am not at all tenacious about offering it as an amendment to this bill, but I could not get it connected with any subject, last session, to which it was germane, and I am seriously apprehensive that that may be its fate at the present session. However, I will risk a few days, and wait for the coming bills of which the Senator speaks. I withdraw it with the understanding that I shall offer it on some other bill to which it will be more appropriate.

Mr. HOWE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate rejected the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WILSON. You can do that in the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. I may just as well do it now.

Mr. WILSON. I think you had better do it there, and let us get along with these amendments.

Mr. GRIMES. We are in Committee of the Whole now.

Mr. HOWE. Very well; it takes no more time for a vote upon reconsideration now than in the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. It takes two votes now in place of one.

Mr. NESMITH. If the Senator from Wisconsin will yield to me for a moment, there was an amendment which I offered, authorized by the Committee on Military Affairs, which has not been acted upon, and I hope he will allow us to have action upon that before he makes his motion.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. FOOT. I rise to a privileged motion. Some time ago I moved that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next, then supposing that the Senate could complete its action on this bill to-night. It is evident now that it will not be able to do so. I think, therefore, we had better come here to-morrow and finish this bill. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed that when it adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT. I move now that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that motion is put, I wish to make another privileged motion, and that is, to reconsider the vote by which the new rule in relation to the oath of office was made the special order for to-morrow, in order that it may be postponed until Monday, so that the Senator from Delaware may have an opportunity of a day certain to speak upon it.

Mr. SUMNER. But I understand the Senate will sit to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. But we wish to finish this enrollment bill then.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on the motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now submit a motion that the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts providing for a new rule of the Senate be postponed until Monday next, and be made the special order for that day at half past twelve o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 14, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXPENSES OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the War Department, transmitting a statement of expenditures of appropriation for the contingent expenses of the military establishment for 1863; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed bills of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 50) to authorize the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War; and

An act (S. No. 57) declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of Illinois therein named.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

The SPEAKER stated that the business in order was the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) postponed on yesterday until after the reading of the Journal to-day, the pending motion being to recommit the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The resolution was reported as follows:

A joint resolution explanatory of an "Act to suppress insurrection, punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes."

Mr. STEVENS. Is this resolution now open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The motion to recommit, which is pending, prevents it.

Mr. COX. I suppose, by unanimous consent, any amendment might be offered here.

Mr. WILSON. I do not withdraw my motion to recommit.

Mr. COX. I do not desire to detain the House at any length. The general subject of confiscation, its legality and policy, was exhaustively discussed in the last Congress. I may be allowed to add a few considerations to those which have heretofore been offered here: first, as to the general policy of the confiscation system, with a view to putting down this rebellion; and secondly, as to the specific mode pointed out by this bill and its amendments.

My impression is that the confiscation system has been an utter failure. Because it has failed, we are to have it newly tinkered session after session, and from day to day, with a view to encourage rapacity and aggravate grievances. Such legislation, sir, only stimulates rebellion. It destroys what remnant of Union feeling may be still remaining in the South. It ignores the first lesson of history, what has been truly called "the principal observation of the best historians, that a whole nation, how contemptible soever, should not be so incensed by any prince or State, how powerful soever, as to be driven to take desperate courses." Instead of disarming the rebel, it arms him, when nearly exhausted, with the weapons of revenge and despair.

Mr. Burke once said, speaking of America:

"You cannot frame an indictment against a whole people."

Neither can you, sir, administer a sweeping penalty upon them.

History is, alas, too full of examples of the ruthless savagery of confiscation. In proportion to the atrocities have been the resistance of the people and desolation of the lands to which such savagery has been applied. If I should wish to present a case where all the horrors of subjugation, penury, devastation, and confiscation have been felt, I would go to Ireland. Crushed by the cruelty of a system similar to that now and here sought to be inaugurated, Ireland points with skeleton finger continually in all her sad history her warning to our rulers: I do not think these cruelties of England toward Ireland are attributable solely to the Puritan spirit of the time of Cromwell, although I find in her history an appeal from New England, in the person of one of her pastors, to Old England, to make the "English sword drunk with Irish blood, to make them heaps upon heaps, their country a dwelling-place for dragons, an astonishment to nations." These excesses were not the result of religious bigotry alone. They date from the earliest connection of Ireland with England. All her rebellions were the reaction of suffering against rapine. With permission, I extract from Smythe's Ireland, Historical and Statistical, volume eleven, page 117, the terrible lesson I have pondered on the general subject of confiscation.

After the expulsion of James from the throne of England the slender relics of Irish possessions became the subject of fresh confiscations. From a report made in 1698 it appears that nearly 4,000 Irish subjects were outlawed, and their possessions, amounting to 1,060,792 acres, confiscated. The area of Ireland is estimated at 11,042,682 acres. The historian says that the forfeitures in the reign of Elizabeth and Mary were 2,838,972 acres; in the reign of James I, at the Restoration, and in 1688, the forfeitures were 11,697,629 acres; so that the whole island has been confiscated, and some parts twice. In one century no inconsiderable portion of the island was confiscated twice, or perhaps thrice: so that at the Union the situation of Ireland is unparalleled in the history of the world. Such universal ruin only served then, as it will serve in this devoted land, to inspire hatred and scorn toward the conquered people whom the victors delighted to trample upon. Retaliation and murder followed closely upon the heels of confiscation.

There is not a wise man who has pictured this history but has condemned the impolicy, not to say illegality, of the forfeitures. They operated always against the conclusion of the war. Had the Irish been regarded as alien enemies instead of domestic rebels they would have had one relief—they would have retained their possessions under the established law of civilized nations.

If I were to assume the premises sometimes assumed by gentlemen upon the other side of the House, that this war is a territorial war, and that every man, woman, and child, loyal or disloyal, within the limits of the belligerent territory are alien enemies and should suffer all the consequences of belligerency, according to the law of nations, then there would be no foundation at all for acts of this kind. If the rebel becomes the enemy, you cannot confiscate the private property as these bills propose. If there be a line of force, protected by bayonets, which, according to the Supreme Court in the Hiawatha case, makes the confederacy a de facto government; if this be true, as argued by the Solicitor of the War Department, and as has been argued by a gentleman in the other end of the Capitol, then there can be no confiscation of rebel property at all in the manner prescribed by the confiscation act. But I do not propose to inquire too curiously into this matter, though it may well engage the attention of jurists to inquire how treason can be alleged or confiscation follow where the accused were under the dominion of a power capable of coercing allegiance to it and holding the sword of the magistrate de facto, though not de jure. Protection and allegiance are correlative. While Government gives the one, it may command the other. If it fail to give protection, would it be just or rational to punish for treason? This subject is treated in the books, and, indeed, was the subject of English statutes. It is thus stated by a writer in the American Cyclopaedia, under the title Treason:

"But from the obvious absurdity of exacting from every individual a sound, or rather a fortunate, judgment as to the obscure and complicated grounds on which the claim to sovereignty often rested, it became and still remains a well-settled rule, that no one incurs the guilt of treason by adherence to a king or government, de facto, although that king or government has but the right of a successful rebel, and loses it all by a subsequent defeat."

It seems to have been adopted by the dominant party in this House that this confiscation system shall, if possible, be carried out in the South. They cannot do it and make it effective under the Constitution. They must do it over that instrument and in spite of its limitations. All the forfeiture which they can obtain under the Constitution is simply the life estate of those who are convicted of treason; and as that life estate is no longer than the halter with which the man is hung, the results would not be worth the pains. Avarice would not be sated by a life estate. Its maw must be gorged. It must have all. Hence, from some motive or other not creditable to our human nature, whether it be from unchristian malice, or corrupt greed, or some other diabolic desire, there seems to be an urgency upon gentlemen upon the other side of the House to break the Constitution to get at the absolute title to the estates of the rebels.

I know it may be said by the gentleman from Iowa that the bill which he has presented does not involve the constitutional question. He tells us that he simply desires to submit the question to the courts, and let them determine whether or not the forfeiture shall be in fee or for life. But, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and others have indicated a desire to move amendments here, repealing the joint resolution of the last Congress, which, on the suggestion of the President, embodied the language of the Constitution. The effect of such repeal will be to leave the original law in full force. Its execution will then be attempted without regard to the Constitution, and the officers of the Government will at once seize upon and sell the property in fee. The vendor will hold it absolutely, and the burden of contesting its validity will be thrown upon children and heirs whose rights the Constitution intended should be guarded. Therefore the question comes up properly on this bill, whether we shall allow any such unconstitutional measure to pass, for even by the bill of the gentleman from Iowa, without any of the amendments proposed, we would be holding out to the judges and to the instruments of this administration a lure to lead them on to follow up this confiscation system for some bad purpose or other. I honor the judiciary, sir, as much as any member; but I am growing distrustful of all powers, wherever deposited.

Now, we know that the judge of the United States court for the eastern district of Virginia, a Judge Underwood, has lately been passing upon this question. I do not know anything about his character, judicial or otherwise, but he has decided, as I understand, in conformity with the argument of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH.] Indeed, the argument of the gentleman is drawn from this precious reservoir of learning. After quoting the constitutional clause, that "Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason; but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained;"

He has held that—

"If we use the word 'except' in the above sense in the constitutional provision, or make it read, 'unless during the life of the person attained,' we shall at once come to the true intent and meaning of the provision, to wit, that the forfeiture was to be perfected during, and not after, the lifetime of the party attained."

Wonderful jurist! Profound logician! Sage philologist! He actually holds that the word "except" in the Constitution really means something else than its own common and technical meaning; that it means "unless." By all the processes of his court, as I am informed, he is striving to give effect to his absurd decision by conveying the absolute title to those estates which have been confiscated before him.

Well, sir, if this judge, under the confiscation law and the joint resolution interpreting it, had a right to do anything of that kind, what is the need of this legislation? Why is this additional legislation proposed? The very fact that the gentleman from Iowa has brought in this bill is evidence to my mind that this judge is a corrupt man and deserves impeachment for breaking down the existing law which the gentleman from Iowa is now trying to amend so as to make such proceedings valid hereafter. The introduction of this bill is a stigma upon his name, which will grow blacker with time. I would need no other evidence of the corruption, the bad heart, and the perverse judgment of that judge than the simple argument which can be drawn from the words of the Constitution against his mode of confiscating property.

The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH.] whose speech I had the pleasure of reading a few minutes since, for I could not altogether hear it while he was delivering it, concluded his argument with an invocation to the House to be virtuous, to stand firm to their duty in this time when the nation is reeling and staggering under the sturdy blows of organized treason. He appeals to us in this time to gather around the Administration and to put down traitors and punish the guilty. Very well. I am with the gentleman in all that, but I should have liked his appeal better had he called on us to stand by the Constitution as all-sufficient for these purposes. In almost the same breath the gentleman says he would oppose the enactment of laws which inflict cruel, harsh, or unjust punishment upon offenders. Indeed! The question here is not how, by penal statutes, to reach the guilty. The guilty are already reached by the present law. This bill reaches beyond the guilty traitor, and involves, by a posthumous punishment, the innocent and good—ay, even the unborn innocents. It inflicts on the children of the guilty the punishment due to the parents; and the gentleman from Indiana, who seems from his speech and countenance to be benevolent, shows that in fact he partakes of the ferocious humanity of the hour by arguing in favor of a bill to punish the inoffensive offspring of the traitor. How kind his logic is may be seen from this extract:

"You cannot take from one that which he hath not. You cannot rob one who is not possessed of anything. I propose to take from the traitor his property before his death, and before it can descend to and vest in his heirs. The child has no natural right to the property of the father. Even in society the child cannot demand as a social right the possession of his father's estate. The father, during his lifetime, can alienate his property by deed of conveyance or by will to take effect at his death; and he can by either process totally disinherit his children, and grant his estate to strangers. It is only in a certain contingency that the child obtains possession of the father's property, as where he dies intestate, and this right of inheritance is purely a social right, depending upon express legislation or immemorial usage ripened into the validity and sanctity of express law."

The child has no natural right to the property of the father! What an unnatural proposition. It is only "by express legislation or immemorial usage" that gives to the child, in the absence of an unnatural will, the estate of the father! Truly, sir, we have fallen on evil times, when to bolster up bills of penalty like this upon the children of the guilty the beautiful and sacred relations of the family are to be disrupted.

I am shocked that in this age and in this country and in this House I am required to stand up before the American people, and, as a matter of pure philanthropy and common decency, protest against the cruel and remorseless character of bills of this kind, and to defend the rights of those who have committed no crime, but upon whom it is proposed to visit, after the death of the parent, the crimes of the ancestor.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana, in his elaborate and learned speech, drew from the old feudal system, from the black-letter laws, from the whole history of our common law with reference to forfeiture, to show that there should be another and a different interpretation given to the Constitution from that which was given by the men who made the Constitution, by the men who passed the law of 1790, to carry out that clause of the Constitution to which I have referred, and by all the interpreters of the Constitution to whom he himself has referred. He says that the science of philology is progressive, and that a word which meant one thing at one time and in one age may mean another thing at another time and in a different age, and upon that principle he says that the word "except" in the Constitution means "unless," and then he draws, like the Virginia judge, the conclusion that the only meaning of the Constitution is that the proceedings shall be commenced in the life of the person attained.

It will be borne in mind that the phraseology of our Constitution was most carefully guarded. It was as pure and simple as the spirit of the Constitution was kind and liberal. The word except, in 1787, had as plain a meaning then as it has now. The word "unless" was not its synonym then, nor is it now, except in very rare and remote instances.

But suppose the gentleman should by some technical logomachy find out that the word "except" meant sometimes "unless," he does not find the word "unless" in the Constitution, and if he had it would make no difference in the argument. The word "except," according to my philology, which has not progressed very rapidly, is derived from the Latin words ex and capio, to take from, to exclude from, to leave out. This is the primary, and not the secondary meaning into which the gentleman would distort it. That is the meaning always attributed to it by all the public writers who have commented on this part of the Constitution. This, too, is the ordinary and simple meaning of the Constitution. It reads in this way, and cannot be made to read in any other: "But no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained." There are some clauses which interpret themselves. Discussion only obscures, and does not elucidate their meaning. This clause is one of them.

Now, suppose the gentleman inserts his favorite word "unless;" how does that help him? It is still a limitation on the power which works corruption of blood or forfeiture, and that limit is during the life of the person attained of treason. That word "unless" does not change the meaning of it at all. You may use it with all emphasis, and still the limitation would be on forfeiture during life.

But, Mr. Speaker, there can be no such construction given to it. The word "except," according to Worcester, Webster, and all other dictionaries, in its first and best meaning simply means "to exclude from;" so that when the Constitution said that the attainder of treason should not work forfeiture of property except during the life of the person attained it meant that the forfeiture should exclude the fee. It was taken out of and from the effects of the forfeiture. The forfeiture never went beyond the life. And there are good reasons for such a construction which the gentleman from Indiana seemed to overlook. He might have found them laid down by Judge Story. He might have found them in the United States court decisions. He might have found them in common sense. He might have found them in the history of the English Parliament. He might have found them in the history of English and Irish confiscations. It was intended by our Constitution to prevent forever this crime of Government taking from those not in legal existence, from minors, from the weak and helpless, from those not guilty from those incapable of crime, that property which always in cases of intestacy, and generally in cases of will, the law gives to the children, and which, by natural right, and according to every code of inheritance known among men, always goes to the children in the absence of a will. The only authority which can be offered by the gentleman for his construction is this Virginia judge. The gentleman has brought no authority here for the purpose of sustaining his view—none whatever. He has evidently been diligent, and has run over all the authorities, and found them against him. Can the gentleman name one authority which sustains his view of the case except this trashy decision of this Judge Underwood? Not one. He relies solely on his progressive philology. So it is progressive. This war is learning us many new meanings to old words and terms. A patriot used to mean one who loved his whole country; who was devoted, by a principle of sympathy and union, to every part; who had a common feeling and a common interest with those who lived under the same Government, or are contained within the same natural or historical boundaries; who cherished the tie that holds the country together, and who held that evil to any part of their fellow-countrymen was evil to themselves. Now it means otherwise. Philology is progressive. Now a patriot is one who can break the supreme law, who can hate half his nation, who can rejoice in the bayonet at the election and the greenback in corruption; who is anxious to see a war of extermination, and who, as the climax of his devotion, is willing to see the last one of his wife's blood-relations offered upon the altar.

Philology is progressive. A traitor now is a man who loves the old order, who dislikes to see the old Constitution dismantled, who is willing to make any sacrifice that will restore the Union, and whose very love of those who used to be under the same old family roof-tree amounts to such a sympathy that he would love to have them all restored.

A philanthropist used to mean a friend of man. Now it means a friend of the black; or, rather, such friendship as drags the negro from home, happiness, and content, to pauperism, crime, and starvation! Philology is progressive.

But Judge Story did not progress as the gentleman from Indiana in his philology; but kept the old meaning of the fathers, which was for all time. My friend from Indiana said that he could find but little written by our commentators upon this mooted clause of the Constitution. When he turned to Judge Curtis he found but one single sentence: "The punishment of treason is not prescribed by the Constitution. It is left to be prescribed by Congress; with the limitation, however, that no conviction for treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture of property except during the life of the offender."

The matter was so plain to Judge Curtis that he could make but little commentary upon it. So it was with Judge Story. After quoting the clause in question, he says:

"Two motives probably concurred in introducing it as an express power. One was, not to leave it open to implication whether it was to be exclusively punishable with death, according to the known rule of the common law, and with the barbarous accompaniments pointed out by it, but to confide the punishment to the discretion of Congress. The other was, to impose some limitation upon the nature and extent of the punishment, so that it should not work corruption of blood or forfeiture beyond the life of the offender."

"It surely is enough for society to take the life of the offender, as a just punishment of his crime, without taking from his offspring and relatives that property which may be the only means of saving them from poverty and ruin. It is bad policy too; for it cuts off all the attachments which these unfortunate victims might otherwise feel for their own Government, and prepares them to engage in any other service by which their supposed injuries may be redressed or their hereditary hatred gratified. Upon these and similar grounds it may be presumed that the clause was first introduced into the original draft of the Constitution; and, after some amendments, it was adopted without any apparent resistance. By the laws since passed by Congress it is declared that no conviction or judgment for any capital or other offenses shall work corruption of blood or any forfeiture of estate. The history of other countries abundantly proves that one of the strong incentives to prosecute offenses as treason has been the chance of sharing in the plunder of the victims. Rapacity has been thus stimulated to exert itself in the service of the most corrupt tyranny; and tyranny has been thus furnished with new opportunities of indulging its malignity and revenge; of gratifying its envy of the rich and good; and of increasing its means to reward favorites and secure retainers for the worst deeds."

—3 Story's Commentaries p. 170.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana could find no reason for the construction which Judge Story gives, but that eminent jurist does find a good and satisfactory reason for the limitation of the punishment, and he gives it in the extract which has just been read. There can be no greater reason against extending a penal law than the fact that such extension will work harm to the innocent and encourage tyranny, rapacity, cruelty, and murder. To say nothing of the impolicy of breaking down allegiance to the Government by such a system of injustice, the reasons I have quoted are sufficient to answer all that the gentleman from Indiana has said in favor of his construction.

Mr. ORTH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question: whether he takes the position that this bill now before us, or any pending amendments to it, will work corruption of blood?

Mr. COX. This bill, with the pending amendments?

Mr. ORTH. Yes, sir. Will it work corruption of blood?

Mr. COX. It cannot work corruption of blood under our Constitution. There can be no such thing as corruption of blood.

Mr. ORTH. I ask the gentleman furthermore whether the authority read from Judge Story does not apply, and do not his remarks apply, to the fact of corruption of blood?

Mr. COX. It applies to this very clause of the Constitution:

"Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained."

It is on that that Judge Story is commenting. The gentleman argued that there had been abuses with regard to corruption of blood and forfeiture of estates. Persons had been found guilty of treason after death, and estates had been forfeited after the person attained had died. Monstrous abuses had grown in consequence of declaring the blood to be attained after death; men were so blackened by the attainder that they could not transmit an inheritance to their descendants. Premising these facts of history, the gentleman argued that the object of this mooted clause of our Constitution was to prevent such abuses. That was the main point of the gentleman's argument. That it is a gross fallacy I shall demonstrate. He said, and said very truly—

"In further support of my position, let me advert to the fact that in England, long prior to and at the adoption of our Constitution, attainder of treason after the death of the supposed traitor (I mean his natural death before trial or even accusation) was of frequent occurrence. This was a monstrous doctrine, shocking to every principle of justice upon which the criminal code is founded, to accuse a man of crime after death, when none is to speak for his innocence, to proceed to trial and judgment, to wrest from innocent hands that property which by law upon his death descended to and vested in his heirs, and forfeit their property, and not his property, to the Government for his supposed criminal conduct. Is it not more just and reasonable to suppose that the Constitution intended to embrace and provide against this monstrous perversion of natural justice than that it intended so absurd a proposition as that the forfeiture of estate should only be for that brief period of time between sentence of death and its execution?"

I answer the question the gentleman puts by saying that it is monstrous, that it is a great and grievous wrong thus to attain a man and forfeit his estate after his death. The history of England in that regard is red with blood and black with cruelty. But from it our fathers learned a lesson. To stain the memory after death, to corrupt the blood after it had ceased to pulsate, and to "rob the innocent posterity of the inheritance which, by the laws of the realm, had descended to and vested in them, as the lawful descendants of their ancestor," was so revolting to every sense of right and justice that I join with the gentleman in execrating such baseness. The creative minds which gave form, life, beauty and symmetry to our Federal system did not tolerate such barbarous codes. They saw these monstrosities. Ay, sir, and in our matchless Constitution they provided against their recurrence here in this free and better country; but not by the clause to which the gentleman would refer. If the gentleman had read the Constitution and the authoritative commentary a little further, he would have found in that clause of the Constitution which says that "no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed" the solution of the problem he discussed. He would then have seen how amply our fathers guarded against those monstrous abuses of power which reached into the tomb and dishonored and disinherited those who surviving mourned. The argument of the gentleman is answered by referring him to that sweeping clause of the Constitution against all attainders. Judge Story says, in speaking of that very clause:

"Such acts have been often resorted to in foreign Governments as a common engine of State; and even in England they have been pushed to the most extravagant extent in bad times, reaching as well to the absent and the dead as to the living. Sir Edward Coke has mentioned it to be among the transcendent powers of Parliament, that an act may be passed to attain a man after he is dead. And the reigning monarch, who was slain at Bosworth, is said to have been attained by an act of Parliament a few months after his death, notwithstanding the absurdity of deeming him at once in possession of the throne and a traitor. The punishment has often been inflicted without calling upon the party accused to answer, or without even the formality of proof, and sometimes because the law in its ordinary course of proceedings would acquit the offender. The injustice and iniquity of such acts in general constitute an irresistible argument against the existence of the power. In a free Government it would be intolerable, and in the hands of a reigning faction it might be, and probably would be, abused to the ruin and death of the most virtuous citizens. Bills of this sort have been most usually passed in England in times of rebellion, or of gross subservency to the Crown, or of violent political excitements—periods in which all nations are most liable (as well the free as the enslaved) to forget their duties and to trample upon the rights and liberties of others."—3 Story, p. 210.

The wrong complained of by the gentleman, and for which he finds a remedy in another clause which he supposes was intended to limit the proceedings and not the forfeiture of estate to the life of the person attained, being thus amply provided against in this clause of the Constitution against bills of attainder,—what other intention or use can there be for the clause in controversy except to limit the forfeiture of the estate during the life of the person attained?

I have agreed with the gentleman from Indiana in condemning, with all the severity of language, the attainder after death and the robbing of the innocent children, who would legally take the estate. But, as a matter of enlightened law, public decency, and Christian morality, I cannot perceive how such a case differs from the bill before us, which he sustains, which proposes to despoil the children of their inheritance for the crime of the parent. Does it make the one a heinous wrong that the attainder is after death and the property had already descended by statute? No, sir; the outrage in both cases consists in robbing the helpless and weak, in punishing the innocent for the guilty. To prevent this, in the interest of society and in the sacred name of the family, and to save the innocent from shame as well as from want, our Constitution declares that the forfeiture should not go beyond the life of the person attained. The grave shall hide his shame. The child shall begin its life clear from stain, unswelled from the attainder of its parent's life, and the inheritance it had expected from the physical source of its being should not be snatched away by unlineal hands or tyrannic rapacity.

Too abundantly does history cumulate the proof of the unwisdom of such legislation as that proposed by this bill. Such legislation is the premium which has ever been offered by power to the cormorants who cling to it, in order to perpetuate itself by sharing in the plunder. It is the reward which the dominant dynasty always gives to the gilded flies which buzz about the corpse of its victim to fatten on its corruption. Perhaps the saddest illustrations which this evil time will furnish of its lustful degeneracy, will be the clanioring of the partisan spies, informers, and mercenaries, who, too cowardly to meet the enemy in fight, will follow in the wake of our armies to speculate upon the plantations and estates which the rebellion has forfeited, but which the Constitution in its beautiful benignity would have saved to the innocent inheritor.

Is it necessary to add further authority as to the impolicy or unconstitutionality of this bill? I might appeal to the writings of the gentleman who has been employed by the Secretary of War to codify the laws of war. I mean the Dr. Francis Lieber who wrote so well of public law and liberty before he had official employment. I could read from his volume on "Civil Liberty" to show the scope and spirit of that part of the Constitution under debate. He says "that the true protection of individual property demands likewise the exclusion of confiscation."

Mr. STEVENS. As the gentleman from Ohio is discussing a grave matter, let me ask him a question.

Mr. COX. Certainly, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason; but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture. Now, has not Congress power to punish other than by attainder, and if that other punishment is the forfeiture of estate, does it violate the first clause of the Constitution?

Mr. COX. I answer the gentleman by referring him to the President's message. [Laughter.] The President in his message to the last Congress held that to divest the title forever—"for treason and ingredients of treason"—was unconstitutional. You passed the joint resolution to obviate his scruples. The gentleman must stand by the Administration. I charge him with being a traitor or a secessionist if he now desert Mr. Lincoln. [Great laughter.] I hope my friend from Pennsylvania, after so long hurling his venomous shafts of satire against this side of the House because we did not always sustain the President, will not himself fail of his loyalty. There may be other punishments beside the forfeiture; but the punishment you now propose, and which I am now discussing, is unconstitutional. So says the Administration. I proudly stand by the Administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. I understand the gentleman as not giving his own opinions, but those of Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. COX. When interrupted, I was giving the views of others—Judge Story, Judge Curtis, and Dr. Lieber. I am not prepared to say that all of Mr. Lincoln's views on that subject are the best. I only say that they should be binding upon that side of the House who have so often urged that failing to sustain the Administration you fail to sustain the Government. Where, then, do gentlemen stand? Opposing the constitutional views of their chief! How handsomely you look before the country in that capacity, after your philippics against our disloyalty! Here is a bill which involves the very exercise of the highest sovereign power, confiscation of the estates of persons absolutely, a scheme of forfeiture involving hundreds, nay, thousands of millions of dollars, or of landed estates, involving in its consequences the prolongation of war and the procrastination of peace, involving the very fate of this Union and all the immense interests imbound with it to the latest generations, and about which the President was so anxious that he took the extraordinary trouble to send an admonitory message to prevent his friends committing a flagrant breach of the Constitution, advising them that he would veto the measure for its gross unconstitutionality; yet gentlemen stand here, after the lapse of a year or more, and by some "progressive philology" undertake to convict and censure their own Executive, overrule his matured judgment and oath, and by failing to give him the required support on so momentous a measure, become, by their own cogent logic, traitors to the Government!

Mr. BROOMALL. The Constitution, punishing treason, allows the alternative of fine and imprisonment to be imposed. If, then, the fine be levied upon the offender's land, and that land is sold, I want to know whether the purchaser would only take life estate.

Mr. COX. Certainly, sir. Under an honest and fearless judiciary, upholding the Constitution as the supreme law, he would only get a life estate. This may be an absurd conclusion; but I know that Judge Story does not think it absurd, nor does the history of these confiscations show it to be absurd. By no scheme or device can you directly or indirectly forfeit the estate, except in pursuance of the Constitution.

Mr. BROOMALL. If the same individual should be indicted before some court for stealing chickens, and fined ten dollars, and his lands sold for that fine, could the estate be sold in fee?

Mr. COX. If the gentleman would get a civil judgment, take out a fieri facias, and make a levy, then I suppose he could sell the fee. But that question of stealing chickens does not interest my constituents, [laughter;] at least those who are white.

When interrupted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I was about to call the attention of the House to Dr. Lieber's volume. He may not be good authority for my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who has, however, informed the House that he is in communication with him, though he told the House the other day that he preferred his own instincts to Dr. Lieber's reason. He argued the other day that he would rather trust his own instincts of liberty than the authority of the war codifier. We have had too much legislation "upon instinct." I think at the time Dr. Lieber wrote the volume from which I was about to quote that he was looking at the spirit of the law with that large roundabout common-sense view which a student of Montesquieu might well take; and with that enlarged observation he tells us:

"The true protection of individual property demands likewise the exclusion of confiscation. For although confiscation, as a punishment, is to be rejected on account of the undefined character of the punishment, depending not upon itself, but upon the fact whether the punished person has any property and how much, it is likewise inadmissible on the ground that individual property implies individual transmission, which confiscation totally destroys. It would perhaps not be wholly unjust to deprive an individual of his property, as a punishment for certain crimes, if we would allow it to pass to his heirs. We do it in fact when we imprison a man for life, and submit him to the regular prison discipline, disallowing him any benefit of the property he may possess; but it is unjust to deprive his children or other heirs of the individual property, not to speak of the appetizing effect which confiscation of property has often produced upon Governments."

"The English attainer and corruption of blood, so far as it affects property, is hostile to this great principle of the utmost protection of individual property, and has come down to the present times from a period of semi-communism, when the king was considered the primary owner of all land. Corruption of blood is distinctly abolished by our Constitution."—Dr. Lieber on Civil Liberty, vol. 1, p. 123.

What does the learned publicist mean by the "appetizing effect of confiscation upon Governments?" Did his prescient mind take in the adjudications of Judge Underwood? Did he look forward to the auction at Alexandria? Did he see town lots and Arlington heights under the hammer? And did he see how little enthusiasm life estates produced, and what an appetizing effect the fee simple would have produced? Has the learned doctor struck, in his comprehensive reasoning, the motive for this bill? I charge that the object of this bill is to make a case in the courts, if possible, whereby some judge like Underwood, by a corrupt, unjust, and dishonest decision, may overturn the organic law to give a quasi absolute title, and thus place the burden on the heirs hereafter of contesting for their rights, and, by harassing and oppressing the innocent and helpless, gain that possession which proverbially is nine points of the law in favor of its continuance. It may well be asked by a considerate legislator, how long will the innocent heirs remain out of their property if they must sue and await the decision of the question in the courts? Shall it be until they attain their majority, or when? After the property has been once taken, there will, I fear, be but little remedy in the courts, for the judiciary itself may be the next department to cower before the behests of power and the "military necessity" of the hour.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill, because I have gleaned from history a profound distrust of all such measures as that of confiscation as a means of restoring allegiance and order. It is the system of revenge. It is hate enacted into law. It will not and it cannot come to good. It is unchristian. Indeed, any system which does not restore good will and kindness between the two sections, and especially if it robs the coming generation, will only tend to perpetuate with the children the hate which we might hope would vanish with time. Such a system is the very wantonness and excess of tyranny. It always has in it a self-punishing and corrective power. It carries a Nemesis with it as inexorable as fate. The history of Poland, Venetia, and Ireland should make us pause. Do we indeed desire to restore our Union? Do we desire to keep our plight to the Constitution? Do we crave in our hearts the return of that happier time when our public order reposed securely in the hearts of the people and in reverence for the Constitution? If we do, let us rather repeal our former harsh and vindictive legislation and not enact other and harsher penalties; and if war must needs go on, if blood, blood, blood must still flow, and force must still be used against those who were once our brethren in the same nationality, then let us add to that force at every moment of decided success to our arms, at every pause in the dread conflict, the benignant policy of conciliation.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to ask him the reference of his quotation from Dr. Lieber?

Mr. COX. I will give it to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not know whether his quotation is a correct one, for the doctor has protested that the gentleman has always misquoted him, and charged him with entertaining opinions the reverse of what his opinions really are.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, when he says I have misquoted Dr. Lieber, cannot be correct, for I have not pretended to quote him until to-day. I said the other day that he was opposed to the unrepublican scheme of conscription. I have the authority, and I will produce it at the proper time.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will permit me I would like to have the doctor himself speak upon this subject. I hold in my hand a note from the doctor, of the date of December 6, 1863.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not quite as logical as I could wish. I do not propose now to discuss the conscription bill. I will pay my respects hereafter to the gentleman on that subject.

Mr. KELLEY. I would rather the question be between the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman he quotes as authority than between the gentleman and myself.

Mr. COX. I should feel it a much greater honor if it were so. [Laughter.]

I was about to conclude by one general observation. The members upon this side of the House have not made, and do not intend to make, any factious opposition to this Administration. We intend to sustain it to the fullest extent of our ability in every legal way which it may mark out—in every way possible by which we can restore the old order of things in this country. Our views do not always agree with your views as to the best mode of restoring the Union and preserving the Constitution. If we could but agree upon one object—the rehabilitation of the States, with all their rights, dignity, and equality unimpaired—though our views may be diverse as to the means to attain that object, this Congress might carve out a historic fame as the restorer of that constitutional freedom which the last Congress did so much to destroy. Upon this side we will sustain any measure to put down rebellion which is warranted by the Constitution. But we will never lay sacrilegious hands upon that ark of our covenant. We constitute the constitutional opposition to this Administration. We have no opposition except it be inspired by that instrument. Its written grants of power, its limitations, and, especially in these times, its reserved powers, furnish the machinery of our antagonism. Drawing from this source, we fear no criticism. We defy all aspersions. Come evil or good report, we will labor—it may be in vain—to protect that instrument against any such breaches as that proposed by this bill and legislation of like character. Since I have been a member of this House I have labored, without rest, to make up in vigilance and study what I lacked in years and experience, that I might perform my whole duty to my constituents, and with one object ever uppermost in my mind—the object which Daniel Webster held to be first with a free people—the preservation of their liberty by maintaining constitutional restraints and just divisions of power.

Mr. ORTH. Before the gentleman from Ohio takes his seat, I would like to ask him one or two questions, and I have no doubt he will answer them without hesitation. My first question is, whether he is in favor of punishing the traitors who have been guilty of bringing on this rebellion?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir. I am in favor of punishing traitors according to the Constitution, by trial, by conviction, and by all the modes pointed out for the punishment of treason.

Mr. ORTH. I have no doubt of that. My next question is, whether he is in favor of punishing traitors by the death penalty?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir; and almost every day I have been voting money and men to inflict that penalty.

Mr. ORTH. I would ask him whether taking from innocent children the life of the father who sustains them is not visiting the sins of the parent on the children?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir; that is one of the incidents which, perhaps, might have once been avoided, but which we cannot now avoid, but for which I am not responsible.

Now, I wish to ask the gentleman whether he is in favor of punishing innocent persons for the guilt of their parents?

Mr. ORTH. No, sir.

Mr. COX. Well, sir, then you must be against this bill.

Mr. ORTH. I contend that we punish those who are guilty during their lifetimes.

Mr. COX. I would be very glad to welcome the gentleman within the pale of humanity.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask my colleague a question, not with any malicious purpose, nor with any design to prevent a calm discussion of so important a question as this. I am sorry that this discussion has assumed a somewhat partisan character. It ought not to have that character at all, and so far as I am concerned it shall not. I wish to ask my colleague a practical rather than a legal question. I wish to know whether the objection he raises to this bill is not itself obnoxious to this objection: we punish men for civil and for criminal offenses, great and small, in all the higher and lower courts of the country by taking their property from them, so that their children can never have the benefit of it after the parent's death. Now, while we do this constantly in our courts, by civil and criminal process, does not my colleague propose to make an exception in favor of the crime of treason? Why should not the children of traitors suffer the same kind of loss and inconvenience as the children of thieves and of other felons do? I ask the gentleman whether his position does not involve this great absurdity and injustice?

Mr. COX. I will say to my colleague that, as he knows very well, in criminal procedures we do not at once by execution reach the real estate. But my colleague cannot withdraw me from my constitutional position as to this bill. All I propose to do in opposing this bill is to stand by the Constitution, and to stand by it all the time, regardless of consequences; and I will ask my distinguished colleague how he reads that clause of the Constitution under debate. Does he believe in the construction which has been given to it by the gentleman from Indiana? [Mr. ORTH.] Does he believe that he can constitutionally take a traitor's property forever, or only during his life? Does he read the Constitution in opposition to Judge Story and to Judge Curtis? Would he set aside the construction given to it by the law of 1790? Or would he, dare he, with his oath upon him, now break the Constitution by voting for this measure, in order to get absolute title to the lands of those in revolt? Would he, to aggravate the punishment of the traitor, or to punish the innocent children of the rebels, break the Constitution?

Mr. GARFIELD. I would not break the Constitution for any such purpose.

Mr. COX. I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would not break the Constitution at all unless it should become necessary to overleap its barriers to save the Government and the Union. But I do not see that in this bill we do break the Constitution. If the gentleman can show me that it violates the Constitution, I will vote against it with him, even though every member of my party votes for it; that makes no difference to me. I will say, however, that I had supposed that the intention of that clause of the Constitution was to prevent the punishment of treason when an individual was declared guilty of it after his death. I had supposed that that was the purpose of it, and if so, it seems to me that this bill is not obnoxious to the objection which the gentleman raises to it.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will examine that other clause of the Constitution which I pointed out, he will find, as Judge Story found, that it provided for the outrage of trial and punishing treason after the death of the person, by prohibiting all bills of attainder. The other clause of the Constitution is so exceedingly plain that the wayfaring man—even Mr. Lincoln himself—did not err in construing it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, with whatever pleasure the gentlemen upon this side of the House may have heard the very novel declaration of the gentleman from Ohio, that he contemplated supporting in all proper measures the Administration in the prosecution of the war and the suppression of the rebellion, it is, perhaps, fortunate that the result of the political elections in the central slave States has placed the Administration beyond the necessity of relying upon his support. Were it not so I incline to think that the kind of support the Administration would receive from the great majority of gentlemen on the other side of the House was indicated early in the session in that resolution proposed by a gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] which pronounced this an inhuman war. For myself, sir, relying on the fact that the people have sent enough of us here for the purpose of supporting the Administration, I would suggest that perhaps gentlemen on the other side of the House had just as well execute the mission with which the constituents that elected them sent them here, charged to oppose, to embarrass, to libel, and to break down the Administration, and leave the support of it to the gentlemen whom the people have sent here to maintain it. With all due respect to the patriotic purposes, the eminent ability of the gentlemen on the other side, when they tender support I shall look at it with something of suspicion, and for myself, shall say, "Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis."

A specimen of that support, Mr. Speaker, is exhibited by the mode in which the bill brought in by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has been received on that side of the House. It relates to what is now the settled policy of the Administration, which gentlemen say they intend to support in the suppression of the rebellion. Whether one degree or another of confiscation be appropriate, whether it shall be extended to the lower actors in this great scene, or whether, as in my judgment proper, it shall be confined to a few of the leaders, still, that the confiscation of property shall attach to some portion of the people engaged in the rebellion is now the settled, resolved policy of the Administration. The bill introduced by the Judiciary Committee is in furtherance of that policy. A joint resolution, in my judgment a very unwise one, of the last Congress, limited the operation of the confiscation law to life estates. This bill contemplates the obliteration of that distinction. In my judgment its language does not accomplish that purpose; and therefore I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STREYENS,] which goes directly to the object sought to be accomplished, by repealing the limiting resolution.

There we are met by the new supporters of the Administration on the other side of the House, with the suggestion that this is uprooting the fundamental law of the Republic. I ask where? What word in the Constitution does it violate? What principle does it in the least degree impeach? They answer, the Constitution declaring that Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but that no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted.

If I have read aright the confiscation law of the last Congress, it nowhere attaches any confiscation or forfeiture to a conviction for treason or to an attainder of treason. Am I right, or am I wrong? There is no word in the law of the last Congress that attaches confiscation of property to conviction of the person for treason, to attainder of the person for treason, on a criminal proceeding in any court of justice. If that be so, then the quotation of the clause from the Constitution is simply irrelevant to the matter in debate, for it is that no ATTAINDER of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the party; so that, if there be no proceeding by indictment, there can be no attainder; and if there be no attainder, there is nothing on which the residue of the words in the Constitution can operate. That simple observation disposes of the whole argument. It is wholly immaterial whether, in the event of the party's being convicted of treason, Congress can or cannot make a consequence of the judgment the forfeiture of lands in fee simple, or is confined to a forfeiture limited in duration by the life of the convict.

The question here is whether there is any process of law, however this provision be construed, by which we cannot effect a forfeiture of the whole fee in lands. That question gentlemen have nowhere met.

If, however, the Constitution limits the consequences of a conviction to a forfeiture for life, to assume that it limits every other form of process of law in like manner, is simply begging the question. The Constitution speaks for itself. It limits the operation of an attainder. It limits nothing else. When, therefore, gentlemen accuse us here of uprooting the settled law of the land, they interpolate language not in the law, and quote it to condemn us. But even if the meaning of the Constitution itself were doubtful in a case of attainder, if the question were whether the judgment of the court should be for the forfeiture of the land for life or in fee, no decision on that could affect any other process of law for confiscating lands without attainder. The doubt upon that question cannot apply to a subject beyond the purview of the question.

Still it is worth while to hazard a suggestion touching the real meaning of those words so confidently invoked by our new allies for our confusion. I desire to speak with all modesty in solving this problem, for difficulties beset every solution, and while it is quite clear that its meaning is not that assumed by our new allies, it is perhaps not so easy to give a demonstrably right solution. I speak with hesitation, because this confidence surprised me into assuming once before the correctness of their interpretation. I think, however, the technical language of the clause read, in the sense it bore in the English law, may light us on our way. I think it points to a very different meaning from that which the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] supposes.

No attainder shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted. Now I take it that the meaning of that clause is that the forfeiture worked shall, must be effected during life. The honorable gentleman from Ohio, and those who think with him, would construe it to be that the forfeiture when worked shall only endure for the life of the party. Palpably the latter is the incorrect and the former the legal meaning. The purpose assumed is the protection of the offspring from punishment for the guilt of the ancestor. But a fine is equally taken from the offspring, as land; yet no one denies the right to fine a person attainted. There was, however, an effect of attainder that did punish the offspring, and the offspring alone. Every student of Blackstone knows this, that the judgment convicting a person of treason operated a corruption of blood. The corruption of blood stopped the transmission of hereditary blood to any heir of the person attainted; so that the legal effect of conviction for treason under the law of England was, first, to forfeit all the property, real and personal, of the person attainted, and, secondly, to corrupt his blood, destroy its heritable quality, so that he could neither take land by descent himself, nor transmit heritable blood to the persons who would, but for his attainder, have been his heirs. He could, in the language of the law, have no heirs. The attainder corrupted his blood, and there was no hereditary blood transmitted to them.

Now, suppose any ancestor of any person convicted and attainted for treason died the day after the execution, owning lands, they could not pass to his son, nor to any collateral relation claiming by descent through him, because the operation of judgment, besides forfeiting the land owned by the party in his lifetime, had corrupted his blood, and no one could trace descent through him. He was a bar, cutting off the relationship between grandfather and grandson. Land which would have come to the grandson if the father had not been a person attainted, instead of going to the heir, was arrested in transit to the heir by the corruption of blood, and passed either to the lord of the fee or to the king.

So that the Constitution deals merely with corruption of blood and its operation. There shall be no corruption of blood worked by attainder or forfeiture except during the life of the person. Attainder worked no forfeiture after the death of the party except by corruption of blood. The forfeiture of a fee-simple estate was not a forfeiture after the life of the party; the whole fee was in the person attainted, his heirs had no interest in it, and no lawyer would ever dream of describing a forfeiture for life by the words of the Constitution, or describe the forfeiture of a fee-simple estate as a forfeiture worked by attainder after the life of the party. It was one of the settled laws of England at that time, and which also prevailed in some of the States of this Union, that the corruption of blood did, what the gentleman from Ohio so properly execrates, operate upon innocent persons with reference to their rights coming from a different source after the criminal had expiated his crime. Now, without meaning to say positively that that is the meaning and operation of the section, I say that in my judgment it comes nearer an intelligible exposition of it than any such theory as this, that you cannot take lands in fee, but you may take all his personal property absolutely, which was the ground of the President's threatened veto of last year; that you can fine a man to the extent of his estate, but you cannot take his lands to pay the fine. And being unintelligible, with all respect to our recent friends, they are driven to say, that in the punishment of treason the Constitution has been guilty of this intolerable folly: that for robbing the mail, or piracy, for any ordinary offense, or murder on the seas or in the Army or Navy; that for any ordinary crime, Congress may prescribe what punishment they please; take the land in fee; but in providing for the punishment of treason, the greatest crime, the most dangerous crime, it has feebly attempted to protect innocent offspring by saving the lands of the convict, but leaving his life and all his personal property at the mercy of the law; that it has been guilty of sanctioning the unrepudiated discrimination between real and personal property, and adopting the aristocratic idea that land was something that must not be taken, but preserved for the heir, that must come down to him by a perpetual constitutional entail. And this anti-republican view is urged to fetter us in breaking the power of an aristocratic rebellion founded on land in large bodies and on negroes. Were there no other objection in this, that simple reductio ad absurdum disposes of the argument.

But, Mr. Speaker, the question here, as I have said, is not, what is the true meaning of this clause of the Constitution, but does it declare that no forfeiture, that no confiscation under any process of law shall affect land for a longer period than the life of the owner? Does it apply to any case where there is no attainder, no conviction?

The law of the last Congress prescribed a different process from conviction in a court of law of the person guilty of the crime. It provides that upon proceedings in the district court in the nature of proceedings in admiralty the lands of certain classes of persons, and all their personal property, shall be forfeited for the use of the Government.

And the Constitution provides that the property of citizens shall not be taken without due process of law. Now, the question which gentlemen on the other side of the House have to argue is, not the law of attainder, but whether the process in the district courts of the United States to confiscate the property of persons proved to be of the specified classes is due process of law for depriving a man of his property under the Constitution. If they cannot maintain that that is not due process of law within the meaning of the Constitution, they cannot throw the least doubt on the constitutionality of this mode of procedure.

If this were a new question, possibly there might be room for argument. But from the first Administration down to this day there has never been a day in which, on the statute-books of the United States, exactly this process to forfeit property for crime without first convicting the owner on indictment has not been prescribed. The law of 1793, among the first of the revenue laws, forfeited property brought in under fraudulent invoices, without proceeding against the individual personally; and all the revenue laws from that day to this enforce these provisions by forfeitures and proceedings in rem.

The navigation laws of the United States, from the earliest days of the Republic, inflict forfeiture in the district court on proceedings against the vessel for violation of those laws without prosecuting the owner, though liable to indictment. Who ever heard that a vessel could not be forfeited unless the master or owner were indicted, or until after they had been indicted? Our laws in reference to trade with the Indians make it penal to carry ardent spirits among them, and they punish the persons guilty and forfeit the property by process in rem in the district court. Is that unconstitutional?

The law for the suppression of the slave trade makes the parties violating it guilty of piracy, and they are liable either to be hung or confined in the penitentiary, according to the grade of the offense. But yet the vessels caught are always forfeited, whether owner or master be prosecuted or not. Was it ever heard that the person must be convicted of the crime before the vessel could be forfeited in the district court? These things are of every-day practice, as every gentleman at all familiar with the ordinary administration of the laws of the United States knows. In a word, indictment and conviction of the person is not the only due process of law by which a person may be deprived of his property. The daily process of levying taxes proves that. And Congress has pleased to authorize confiscation without conviction, but in the time-honored forms of the early Republic.

And in reference to another species of property about which gentlemen upon the other side of the House usually show more interest than about lands, in reference to negroes, I have a word to say. We have in that case the same principle of confiscating property by proceedings before conviction of the delinquent, settled by the laws of Maryland and of Virginia, adopted by Congress as the laws in the two counties of the District of Columbia, from the earliest days of the Republic down to the day on which I am speaking. The law of Virginia goes as far back as the days of Jefferson. It prohibited the introduction of slaves into Virginia from any other State, and from foreign countries; and while it prescribed the penalty on the party so introducing them, it also declared the slave free. The gentlemen from Maryland here know very well that was the law of Maryland down to within a few years; and, to some extent, it is so now. When Congress adopted the laws of Maryland and Virginia, both of those statutes were the laws of this District; and they were in force down to the time of the emancipation of slaves in this District.

Now, what was the ordinary process in these cases? I do not remember in my experience while practicing as a lawyer, either in Virginia or the District of Columbia or in Maryland, of an indictment or action for the fine or forfeiture against a party introducing negroes. It was the every-day practice when I came to the bar that negroes, brought into that part of the District which was on the south of the Potomac river, contrary to law, should apply to the court and bring a suit for their freedom, and it was done in the ordinary form of an action for trespass, because the master had illegally imprisoned them, and the judgment of the court was one cent damage against the master for the imprisonment. The question really involved was freedom or slavery. The law vested freedom; the court authenticated it. In other words, the operation and theory of the law was that the act of bringing a negro across the line was to invest him with his freedom; that it deprived the master of his property and invested the negro with the right to sue the man for the wrong committed. That has been adjudged again and again by the courts of Virginia, and by the court of appeals of Maryland; and though writs of error have more than once carried such cases in this District to the Supreme Court, that tribunal never dreamed that this was a forfeiture of property without due process of law. If gentlemen will take the trouble to run through the volumes of the Supreme Court reports, they will find several cases; one so recent as 2 Howard, in which that form of proceeding was recognized as a competent mode in which to assert the right of freedom, which was a forfeiture of the master's right. The man who was a slave on the other side of the line became a free-man by being brought this side of the line; his master was not indicted, nor was his freedom a consequence of the conviction of his master, but he acquired his title to freedom by the act of the Congress of the United States, which inflicted forfeiture on his master for violating it.

Congress, during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, I think, in organizing the Territories of Louisiana and Mississippi, in like manner forbade the introduction of slaves from abroad, and freed them when introduced by the master. And if we are to be told that this was antique legislation, and not fit for the light of these modern days, I ask gentlemen to read the compromise measures of 1850 brought in by the illustrious Kentuckian, Henry Clay, and passed by a Congress that thought then that they had averted the crisis that we now write under; let them read the law forbidding the slave trade in the District of Columbia, where the hand of Henry Clay traced the words of forfeiture—that if any slave should be brought into this District by its owner, contrary to the provisions of the act, he should thereupon become liberated and free.

Now, that covers all the confiscation acts of the last Congress. It is wholly immaterial whether it relates to land or to personal property, whether you forfeit lands or negroes. That would even meet the technical objection of the gentleman from Ohio, because formerly in Virginia, as everybody knows, slaves were real estate, not personal estate, passing to the heirs and not to the executors; and it is only of late years that they have been treated as personal estate, though in the widow's share of them the traces of their real character still remain visible. Now that is the question that is involved in the confiscation law, and it is the only question that is involved. It is not whether attainder can work corruption of blood affecting the heirs; of course it cannot; it is not whether attainder can operate forfeiture of lands descending after the death of the attainted person, nor whether an attainder is confined to carrying a life estate by forfeiture out of a fee; that is not the question. The question is whether by other process of law not connected with indictment of the person, not following upon attainder, the United States Government can say that those who have been in arms against it shall forfeit their property, and that the tribunals of the country shall enforce it in rem; and this is settled by the traditional laws of the Republic.

Mr. BLISS obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS: The morning hour having expired, I move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON THE CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the consideration of the following concurrent resolution from the Senate:

Resolved, That a joint committee of three members of the Senate and four members of the House of Representatives be appointed to inquire into the conduct and expenditures of the present war; and that they have power to send for persons and papers, and to sit during the sessions of either House of Congress, and to employ a stenographer.

Mr. GOOCH. I move that the House concur in that resolution.

Mr. COX. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the resolution had better go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COX. Very well; I withdraw my motion, and move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to on a division—yeas 92, nays 25.

SECOND ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR.

Bill of the Senate No. 50, to authorize the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CHICAGO IMPROVEMENTS.

A bill (S. No. 57) declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, therein named, was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will state to the House that the Committee on Commerce have had a similar bill under consideration, and have directed me to report it to the House. There can be no objection to it, I think, on the part of any gentleman; and I ask the previous question on its passage.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee of Ways and Means the joint resolution (S. No. 15) amendatory of the joint resolution to supply in part deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for bounties to volunteers, and asked that it be put upon its passage.

The joint resolution was read. It directs that the money paid by drafted persons under the act for calling out the national forces, or that may be paid under any act for like purpose, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and drawn out on requisitions as the other public moneys for the expenses of the draft and for the procurement of substitutes; and it appropriates the money for that purpose.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration as a special order of a bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

The bill was read through, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duty provided for in section forty-one of an act entitled "An act to support the Government, and to pay interest on the public debt," approved July 1, 1862, and in addition to duties payable for licenses, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all spirits that may be distilled and sold, or removed for consumption and sale, of first proof, the duty of sixty cents on each and every gallon; and said duty shall be a lien and charge on such spirits, and also on the distillery used for distilling the same, with all the stills, vessels, fixtures, and tools therein, and the lot or tract of land whereon the said distillery is situated, until the said duty shall be paid: Provided, That the said duty on spirituous liquors, and all other spirituous beverages enumerated in this act, shall be collected at no lower rate than the basis of first proof, and shall be increased in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of first proof: Provided further, That all spirits on hand for sale, or removed for consumption or sale, upon which no duties have been paid or collected, and upon which no returns have been made, whether distilled prior to the date of this act or not, shall be subject to the rates of duty provided by this act from and after the 12th day of January, 1864.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all spirits or other articles on which duties are imposed by the provisions of this act, or of the act referred to in the first section of this act, and amendments thereto, which shall be found in the possession or custody or within the control of any person or persons, for the purpose of being sold by such person or persons, in fraud of the internal revenue laws, as heretofore referred to, or with design to avoid payment of said duties, may be seized by any collector or deputy collector who shall have reason to believe that the same are possessed, had, or held for the purpose or design aforesaid, that the same shall be forfeited to the United States; and also all articles of raw materials found in the possession of any person or persons intending to manufacture the same for the purpose of being sold by them, in fraud of said laws, or with design to evade the payment of said duties, and also all tools, implements, instruments, and personal property whatsoever, used in the place or building or within any yard or enclosure where such articles on which duties are imposed, as aforesaid, shall be found, may also be seized by any collector or deputy collector, as aforesaid, and the same shall be forfeited as aforesaid; and the proceedings to enforce said forfeiture shall be in the nature of a proceeding in rem in the circuit or district court of the United States for the district where such seizure is made, or in any other court of competent jurisdiction; and any person who shall have in his custody or possession any such spirits or other articles, subject to duty as aforesaid, for the purpose of selling the same with the design of avoiding payment of the duties imposed thereon, shall be liable to a penalty of $500, or not less than double the amount of duties fraudulently attempted to be evaded, to be recovered as other penalties provided by the act heretofore mentioned. And also that the spirits and other articles which shall be so seized by any collector or deputy collector shall, during the pendency of such proceedings, be delivered to the marshal of said district, and remain in his care and custody and under his control until final judgment in such proceedings shall be rendered: Provided, however, That where, owing to the perishable nature of the property seized, expense of storage or other circumstances, the owner thereof may, if he so choose, apply to the assessor of the district, who shall, if he deem it expedient that the property so seized should be sold, appraise or have the same appraised under his direction and control, and the owner may give bond or bonds in an amount equal to the appraised value, with such sureties as the assessor shall adjudge good and sufficient, which shall be by him transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be held and collected, or any part thereof, or surrendered in accordance with the final judgment, order, or decree of the court having jurisdiction of the case; or, if the owner shall not apply as aforesaid, the assessor, upon the application of the marshal of the said district in whose custody and control said spirits or other articles seized as aforesaid may be, shall appraise or have the same appraised under his direction and control, and shall issue and return to the marshal aforesaid an order to sell the same, and the said marshal shall thereupon advertise and sell the same, and the proceeds of sale, after deducting therefrom the costs of seizure and sale, shall be paid into the court having jurisdiction of the case, and paid out as the said court shall on final judgment order or decree.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all distilled spirits upon which an excise duty is imposed by law may be exported without payment of said duty, and when the same is intended for exportation may be removed without being charged with duty, if transported directly from the distillery or bonded warehouse, under such rules and regulations, and upon the execution of such transportation or other bonds, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; said bonds to be taken by the collector of internal revenue of the district in which such distilleries or bonded warehouses may be situated to a bonded warehouse at any port of entry of the United States—said warehouse at the port of entry to be established in conformity with the law and Treasury regulations, and to be used exclusively for the storage of distilled spirits—and to be placed in charge of a proper officer of the customs, who, together with the owner and proprietor of the warehouse, shall have the joint custody of all the distilled spirits stored in said warehouse; and all the labor on the goods so stored shall be performed by the owner or proprietor of the warehouse, under the supervision of the officer of the customs in charge of the same, at the expense of the said owner or proprietor, and shall also be subject to the same rules and regulations, and be chargeable with the same costs and expenses, in all respects, as other goods may be subject to that are deposited in public store for exportation from the United States; and no drawback shall in any case be allowed on any distilled spirits upon which an excise duty has been paid either before or after it has been placed in bonded warehouse as aforesaid.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duties provided in the act referred to in the first section of this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all cotton produced or sold and removed for consumption, and upon which no duty has been levied, paid, or collected, a duty of two cents per pound; and such duty shall be and remain a lien thereon until said duty shall have been paid, in the possession of any person whomsoever; and further, if any person or persons, corporation or association of persons, remove, carry, or transport the same, or procure any other party or parties to remove, carry, or transport the same from the place of its production, with the intent to evade the duty thereon, or to defraud the Government, before said duty shall have been paid, such person or persons, corporation or association of persons, shall forfeit and pay to the United States double the amount of said duty, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, That all cotton sold by or on account of the Government of the United States shall be free and exempt from duty at the time of and after the sale thereof, and the same shall be marked free and the purchaser furnished with such a bill of sale as shall clearly and accurately describe the same, which shall be deemed and taken to be a permit authorizing the sale or removal thereof.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That every collector to whom any duty upon cotton shall be paid shall mark the bales, or other packages, upon which the duty shall have been paid, in such manner as may clearly indicate the payment thereof, and shall give to the owner, or other person having charge of such cotton, a permit for the removal of the same, which shall be dated and contain a description, including the weight and other marks of the bales, or packages, and a statement of the fact that the duty has been paid. Whenever any cotton, the product of the United States, shall arrive at any port of the United States from any State in insurrection against the Government, the assessor or assistant assessor, under the act referred to in the first section of this act, shall immediately assess the taxes due thereon, and shall, without delay, return the same to the collector or deputy collector of said district, and the said collector or deputy collector shall demand of the owner, or other person having charge of such cotton the tax imposed by this act, and assessed thereon, unless evidence of previous payment of said tax shall be produced, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall from time to time prescribe; and in case the tax so assessed shall not be paid to such collector within thirty days after demand, the collector or deputy collector, as aforesaid, shall institute proceedings for the recovery of the tax, which shall be a lien upon said cotton from the time when said assessment shall be made.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the date on which this act takes effect, in computing the allowance or drawback upon articles manufactured exclusively of cotton when exported, there shall be allowed, in addition to the three per cent duty which shall have been paid on such articles, a drawback of two cents per pound upon such articles in all cases where the duty imposed by this act upon the cotton used in the manufacture thereof shall be satisfactorily shown to have been previously paid; the amount of said drawback to be ascertained in such manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passage of this act, in addition to the duties heretofore imposed by law, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the spirits distilled from grain or other materials, imported from foreign countries, of first proof, a duty of forty cents on each and every gallon, and no lower rate of duty shall be levied or collected than the basis of first proof, and shall be increased in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of first proof.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by sections for amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I am directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move one or two amendments. I move to amend by inserting on line twenty, after the word "spirits," the words "distilled since the 31st day of August, 1862." By the law which laid the tax originally on whisky, the article then on hand, previously manufactured, was exempted from taxation. This amendment is merely to continue that exemption, so as not to run back behind the time of the original law which laid the tax.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to make a remark in opposition to the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. It is known, Mr. Chairman, that a large quantity of spirituous liquors has been distilled and bonded in the various markets of the country since the passage of the act of 1862, and since the passage of the act amendatory of it assessing a tax of twenty cents per gallon. I am opposed to having included within the operation of this bill any spirits manufactured prior to its passage. In my judgment it is not fair.

Mr. STEVENS. I would suggest to the gentleman that my amendment does not affect that question. The question can be raised after the amendment is acted on.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Then I decline making any further remarks on the subject.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether he intends to put through this bill directly.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not intend to force any bill through until gentlemen have had an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. BROOKS. The bill has not been published in any of the newspapers of the country, and I think we should not act upon it finally until the press shall have spread it before the people, as it is a bill of great importance to our constituents.

Mr. STEVENS. After the Committee of Ways and Means shall have perfected the bill, if the gentleman desires more time, I shall not insist upon its immediate consideration.

Mr. BROOKS. I also wish to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means why it is that the articles of spirits and cotton have been specially selected, and whether he intends to bring in a general taxation bill including tobacco, petroleum, and other articles.

Mr. STEVENS. As to whisky, it is being very largely manufactured, of course in anticipation of the tax, and we have thought it right to give the earliest notice to the country as to the tax which it is intended to impose. As to tobacco, we find a greater difficulty in drawing a law that will meet the views of the committee and will probably answer the purpose. It is a very difficult question to decide whether the tax should be laid on the leaf, according to the recommendation of the Department, or whether it should be continued, with some modifications, on the manufactured article. If it is to be laid on the leaf, gentlemen will see that it requires considerable machinery to perfect it, and it would take some time to draft a bill to effect that object. If it is to be continued on the manufactured article, it requires many more guards than we now have to protect the Government from fraud. It is just so with the article of oil. We find great difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to the best mode of laying a duty on it. We therefore desire to deliberate a little longer upon it; and we intend to enlarge very much the articles to be taxed.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish also to ask the gentleman, what is the amount of revenue which it is calculated will be produced from this increased duty on spirits?

Mr. STEVENS. If the law shall be fairly executed it cannot, I think, be less than $25,000,000 for the next year. The law as it now stands has been imperfectly executed, so imperfectly that not one third of the revenue which the Government ought to have had has been collected.

Mr. BROOKS. One other point.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me answer further. This is my own calculation. The Department calculates that the bill will produce $36,000,000. I do not think that it will produce so much. Last year we collected $4,000,000, when the amount consumed ought to have produced some twelve or thirteen million dollars; and this was owing to the exceptional mode of collection.

Mr. BROOKS. I would like to know whether the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has taken into consideration the important fact that, with a long line of frontier upon the Canadas, this high duty of sixty cents per gallon may not lead to a great amount of smuggling. Does he not think that there is some danger in laying so high a duty?

Mr. STEVENS. All high duties lead to smuggling. There is no doubt of that. Therefore the guards must be more stringent. We think that the high duty of sixty cents per gallon will not reduce the manufacture of the article in this country. Experience in England has shown that as the duty was raised upon spirits, even when it reached twelve shillings per gallon, or $2 50 of our currency, which it is now, it has never seriously affected the consumption of the article. In other words, men will drink, no matter what it costs. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, there is a vast difference between the topography of the United States and that of Great Britain and Ireland. Great Britain and Ireland are surrounded by water, while in respect to the United States there is only an imaginary boundary of two thousand miles, along which it will be utterly impossible for a cordon of custom-house officers to be effectually established.

Mr. STEVENS. The committee were aware of that difficulty.

Mr. BROOKS. My own impression is that this duty is too high to lead to actual revenue.

Mr. STEVENS. Of course there will be smuggling. I hope that the committee will now be permitted to submit its amendments.

Mr. BROOKS. I want to have information from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and I may not have another opportunity. He answers questions so usefully to us all that I hope he will pardon me for further taxing his patience.

Mr. STEVENS. I would be glad to have questions put to me, and to have suggestions made by which the bill may be perfected.

Mr. BROOKS. And now, Mr. Chairman, as I have the floor, I desire to call the committee's attention to another and important matter. I feel somewhat embarrassed about it; indeed, after the Latin quotation of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] it is somewhat doubtful whether any of us on this side of the House have any place here to do anything, except as tenants by courtesy. "Non tali auxilio," said he, "nec istis defensoribus eget."

The same Latin poet, however, who said this, also said, "Fas est ab hoste doceri."

Let me beg the gentlemen, then, on the other side of the House, especially the New England gentlemen connected with manufactures, to hear me on a matter of importance at least to them.

This bill taxes all spirits sixty cents per gallon, in addition to duties payable for licenses. Alcohol, which is a component part of many, very many manufactured articles, is under this bill taxed at least $1 13 per gallon, for sixty cents on proof spirits nearly doubles on alcohol. I have suddenly made up list of a few articles into which alcohol enters; namely, for hatters, soaps, candles, heating chafing dishes, jewelers' and artisans' lamps, perfumery, medicines, hair tonics, cleansing purposes, an embrocation, dyeing, chemicals, vinegar-making, whisky vinegar, fortifying wines and cider, preserving fruits, culinary purposes, varnish, dissolving gums, burning to give light, gunpowder, gun caps and cartridges, &c., &c. Now, England, in order to protect her manufactures, reverses this policy of taxation in order to enable her people to compete with foreigners. There is an article of commerce, that called methylene, (mèthu, wine, and uhlé, wood,) or methilated spirits, upon which there is no excise. When wood is subjected to destructive distillation there is formed along with the tar, acetic acid, and other products, a highly volatile and inflammable liquid, which, when purified by distillation of quicksilver, is called spirit or alcohol of wood, or pyrolytic spirit. The hydrocarbon which forms the basis of this form of alcohol, and to which this term methylene has been applied, is presumed to consist of carbon and hydrogen in proportion. This methylene, entering largely into the manufacture of varnishes, lacquers, and other articles, is sold duty free. The bill, levying its sixty cents excise on all spirits, and the higher the proof the higher the duty, adds a burden to the manufacturers not known even in over-taxed England, and there is no escape from it. I respectfully suggest that before we press the bill further, we wait to let both manufacturers and consumers, who really pay the excise as well as the other very heavy taxes upon manufactured products, know what we are about. The bill should be read at least from Eastport, Maine, to St. Louis, Missouri, before we vote upon it. Besides, it is retroactive, and we lose no revenue by taking time.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I would like to know whether the Committee of Ways and Means will consent to let this bill go over for a single day. I was absent yesterday when it was made a special order, and was not aware of the fact when it came up. Other gentlemen who represent interests affected by this bill are in the same situation, and I would be glad if we were allowed time for preparation.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggested before that when the committee had made its amendments I would not object to the bill going over.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. With the understanding that the next time it comes up we shall commence at the beginning.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the words proposed to be inserted the words "unless still owned by the distiller thereof."

I would say in behalf of that proposition that the warehouse system established by the act of 1862 furnished encouragement and facilities for persons manufacturing ardent spirits to keep it on hand temporarily without the payment of duties. I mean that those spirits which were manufactured after August, 1863, were manufactured with the understanding that the duty of twenty cents alone would have to be paid when sold or removed for sale from the warehouses. Manufacturers have stored up their supplies with that understanding, and in conformity with the law, and it cannot be charged upon them that they, in the mere spirit of speculation, have availed themselves of the prospect of an increase in the price of spirits by an increase of the tax to speculate on the revenue. They are not speculators in the proper sense of the term. They are the legitimate manufacturers of the article. They manufactured it with a given understanding—the expectation that the tax of twenty cents would remain permanent as to all spirits manufactured while the law was in force. As to them, it seems to me this increase of duty should operate only from the time the law takes effect, or from the time it was introduced into this House, the 12th of January, 1864.

So far as the speculation in this article is concerned, in the expectation of an increased duty, that case stands upon a different footing. So far as the distiller is concerned, the spirits manufactured by him under the law in force for the time being, the duty under that law ought to be the only duty imposed. I think that is only justice to the distilling interest of the country, composed of a body of men who have acted as fairly as any other class in connection with the revenue. I think the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will bear evidence of the fact that the present system of duties, imposing twenty cents a gallon on whisky, was in the main adopted at the instance of the manufacturers themselves. They regarded it as a pretty high duty, but they were willing to pay the duty, rather than run the risk of frauds on the Government by the attempt to impose a part of the tax on rectified and other combinations of ardent spirits. Nothing can be more unjust, if such be the effect of this section, than to attempt to increase the tax on whisky in the warehouses of the distillers, on the ground that no tax has been paid. They were permitted to keep their spirits on hand by the law, and would thus be ensnared into an increased tax by relying on the law under which the whisky on hand was manufactured. Nothing could be more unjust.

I would say, in addition, that as to speculators who have purchased whisky in anticipation of the imposition of this increased tax, they stand upon an entirely different footing. They have purchased, seeking to avail themselves of the benefit resulting from an increased taxation. They are mere speculators, while the others are bona fide manufacturers of an article of commerce.

Mr. STEVENS. If I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, I must oppose it. I understand it to lay a tax upon all whisky in the hands of the distiller, no matter when distilled. Now, when we passed the law of 1862, after a long discussion in Congress we came to the determination to lay the tax only upon future products. All whisky which was on hand at that time was free from taxation. Now, it so happens that there is a great deal of whisky in the country which was distilled two, three, and four years before the tax was laid, and it is still on hand, because the distillers keep it to ripen. I know of six hundred barrels in my own county which is still in the hands of the distiller, he, however, having ceased to distill. There is no principle of justice, it seems to me, which would justify us going back and imposing this increased duty upon such whisky. It should be exempt.

All that has been manufactured since 1862, and is still in the hands of the distillers, is reached by this law; and all that was manufactured before 1862, and which we then expressly exempted from taxation, ought not now, it seems to the committee, be subject to this increased tax.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me inquire of the gentleman whether I am to understand that this increased duty of forty cents is intended to be imposed on the whisky manufactured on the 1st of August, 1862, and which is still owned by the distillers under the provision of the law authorizing the distiller to place distilled spirits in warehouse, and pay the duty at the time of removal from the warehouse?

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman will see that all whisky that has paid a tax is exempt from this increased taxation. We did not think we had a right to go back and tax that which had been once taxed by the Government, whether it is in a warehouse or not. But wherever the distiller has failed to comply with the law, no doubt from fraudulent purposes; where he has not made his monthly return and paid his tax, we impose this duty upon him, and we impose none upon the distiller who has made his return or paid his tax.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that section forty-four of the act of 1862 may be read, and then I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read the forty-fourth section of the law of 1862, which provides that the owner or owners of any distillery may erect at his or their own expense a warehouse of iron, stone, or brick, with metal or other fire-proof roof, to be contiguous to such distillery, and declares such warehouse, when approved by the collector, a bonded warehouse of the United States, to be used only for the storing of distilled spirits, and to be in the custody of the collector or his deputy, and provides further, that the duty on spirits stored in such warehouses shall be paid when it is sold or removed for sale.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would now ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if this additional duty of forty per cent. is to be imposed upon spirits stored in warehouses under the provisions of that section, and upon which the tax has not been paid, because it is not payable until the spirits are removed for sale.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman will remember that the law requires that tri-monthly returns shall be made by every distiller of whatever he distills, whether he puts it into warehouse or not.

Now, where a distiller has made his return, this bill expressly says that he is to pay no tax upon the spirits so returned, because he has complied with the law; but if he has put into the warehouse whisky of which he has made no return and of which he has made no sale, thus evidently intending to evade the law, we tax him this additional sum upon that.

Mr. HOLMAN. With that explanation, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. NOBLE. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] if it would have accomplished the purpose sought by him, would have received my support; but it seemed to me that it would not accomplish that purpose.

The original act on this subject prescribes a time within which the manufacturer shall make his return, and the mode in which he shall do it; and there are penalties attached to an attempt to avoid the law. I understand the purpose of this bill to be to impose upon the manufacturer who has manufactured distilled spirits an additional tax, although he may have complied fully with the letter and spirit of the original act.

Let us suppose, for instance, that there is a distiller in Ohio who has manufactured a large quantity of spirits; the law requires him to make his return within a given time; it is not required that he shall make it in anticipation of that time; and yet, by the provisions of this bill, if he has not made it, although he may still make it within the time fixed by the original act, this additional tax is to be imposed upon him. That is certainly not in accordance with the spirit of the original act. Suppose a manufacturer is manufacturing at the rate of twelve or fifteen hundred bushels a day, he is not required to make a return for three months.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe it is three times a month.

Mr. NOBLE. Well, that makes no difference. This bill provides that if he has not made his return on the 12th day of January, 1864, he shall be subject to this additional tax. I say that that is unjust and contrary to the spirit of the original act. The original act imposed a tax of twenty cents per gallon. A manufacturer, who has manufactured under that act with the intention of making his return within the time prescribed by that act, might, under this bill, be taxed upon the very article which he may return within the time prescribed by the act. That is what I complain of. I say that the manufacturer should not be taxed an additional amount over and above that provided by the act of 1862 upon that which has been manufactured prior to the passage of this bill, and I propose to submit an amendment to that effect.

It has been alleged by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that the amount of goods retained in the hands of the manufacturers may have been retained for the purpose of evading the law. If I remember the law aright, there are in it guards sufficient to protect the Government against any such frauds. There are penalties provided sufficient to guard the Government against anything of that kind.

The amendment which I propose to offer is to exempt the manufacturer, so far as the amount on hand is concerned, up to the day of the passage of this act. After the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is disposed of, I propose to submit an amendment, to strike out all after the word "after," in the twenty-fourth line, and insert the words "the passage of this act."

Mr. MARCY. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means why it is that there is a discrimination in this bill between the duty on home-manufactured whisky and that on imported whisky. The former is to be taxed sixty cents per gallon, and the latter forty cents. I want to know why the discrimination.

Mr. STEVENS. Under the law as it stands, and without the additional forty cents, the foreign article pays twenty cents per gallon. This is, therefore, to place the foreign article on precisely the same footing as the home-manufactured article. We have raised the tariff the same as we have raised the tax.

Mr. MARCY. It occurs to me that the imposition of a heavy tax on liquors will tend to encourage smuggling along the sea-coast and on our Canadian frontier, and thus defeat the ends of legislation in the matter of revenue, as well as have a demoralizing effect. That is the experience in every country where the same legislation has been attempted.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Chairman, the question, as I understand it, involved in the amendment offered by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, is as to on what spirits duty should be levied, as to on what the law should be operative. Now, in my judgment, a wise policy should indicate to Congress the propriety of imposing the duty on all spirits now in existence, whether in the hands of the manufacturer or in the hands of speculators and operators who have recently been in the market, advised in advance of Congress itself as to our probable action, and who have thus monopolized millions of gallons. I believe, sir, that the additional duty of forty cents per gallon which this law provides should be placed on that class of spirits, and should also be imposed on the spirits that have already paid the twenty cents per gallon under the law of 1862, so that politicians, men who have been advised, in advance of members of Congress, what the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury on this question would be, who have been into the market, and who are interested, directly or indirectly, in millions of gallons of the article, may be foiled in their efforts to obtain exclusive advantages over the manufacturer and over the consumer.

From what has been said here to-day, some gentlemen appear to be under the impression that the manufacturers are to bear this burden. That is not so. It is the consumer, and not the manufacturer. Capital can always protect itself. The manufacturer takes good care to put on the price of the commodity which he manufactures any additional burdens that the Government imposes. It goes from him to the merchant, from the merchant to the trader, from the trader to the consumer, the additional tax running through all the ramifications of trade, until finally it comes to the man who consumes the article.

There is another error here to-day, Mr. Chairman; that is, that we are imposing a tax upon beverage. Why, sir, three fourths of the article proposed to be taxed by this bill are used in the arts. It is used for various manufacturing purposes. It is used to make varnishes of. It is used to make burning-fluid. It is used to fasten the colors in a dye largely used by cotton manufacturers. The popular error that this bill proposes simply to impose a tax on what some gentlemen deem to be a vice, on the practice of drinking whisky, is, in my judgment, entirely wrong. But, sir, were it so, it is as much the duty of Congress to protect the consumer of whisky as it is to protect the consumer of any other article.

I have prepared an amendment, which I will offer at the proper time, to strike out the words in the twenty-first and twenty-second lines, "on which no duties have been paid and collected and no returns made," and to insert at the end of that section the words:

Except that spirits which have been already taxed under the law of July 1, 1862, shall not pay more than the additional or increased tax provided for by this act.

The object being, Mr. Chairman, that all spirits shall bear this burden; that men who have operated on exclusive information obtained in advance of the session of Congress as to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and a few of whom in my own State alone have millions of dollars invested in this article, may bear their share of the burden, and may pay their proportion of the revenue to be derived from the taxation on whisky. And while it would be improper to impose upon them the whole sixty cents per gallon, perhaps it would be just and proper for them to pay the additional forty cents per gallon which is proposed over the law of 1862. Therefore, at the proper time, I will submit the amendment which I have indicated.

Mr. STEVENS. I thought that it was generally understood that the Committee of Ways and Means should be allowed to proceed to perfect the bill, and that then to-morrow it should be started de novo for any amendments which gentlemen might wish to move to make the measure suit them. I hope that that course will be pursued.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I have amendments to offer, and I hope that the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be adopted. It will give us all a chance.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, while I am up I will correct an error which seems to pervade both sides of the House. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] to say that three fourths of the spirits produced are used in the arts in the shape of alcohol. I suppose that in England they use the same proportion of spirits for that purpose that they do here; for, sir, we know that their manufactures are very large. This matter was examined thoroughly there. It was ascertained that in 1855 over twenty-two million gallons of spirits had been manufactured, and that of that amount one hundred and forty-six thousand three hundred and seventy-four gallons had been used for the purposes of the arts and manufactures. There is a great difference between that amount and the allegation that three fourths of the spirits produced are used for the arts and manufactures. It stands at twenty-two millions to one hundred and forty-six thousand. But this is not speaking to my amendment. I hope that it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out in the twenty-first line the word "and," and in lieu thereof to insert the word "or;" so that it will read:

Provided further, That all spirits on hand for sale, or removed for consumption or sale, upon which no duties have been paid or collected, or upon which no returns have been made, whether distilled prior to the date of this act or not, shall be subject to the rates of duty provided by this act from and after the 12th day of January, 1864.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GANSON. The same amendment should be made in the ninth line, so that it would read:

That from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duty provided for in section forty-one of an act entitled "An act to support the Government, and to pay interest on the public debt," approved July 1, 1862, and in addition to duties payable for licenses, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all spirits that may be distilled and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, of first proof, the duty of sixty cents on each and every gallon.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. In the twelfth and thirteenth lines of the first section it is provided that this debt shall be a lien upon the distillery. There may be a case where another person owns the land and the distillery, and that the person in default is a mere tenant. I want that amended so that the lien shall be upon the parties in default.

Mr. STEVENS. There will be an opportunity afforded to-morrow for that and for all other amendments.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. There is one question which I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I see that it has been stated that the additional duty on liquors manufactured from domestic material is forty per cent., and on those from that which is imported forty per cent. It is true, as the gentleman says, that the increase is equal upon both, but as the law now stands the duty upon those imported is twice that upon liquors produced from articles raised at home. There would be more justice between these two classes that the rate of increase should be in the same proportion. In other words, the duty should be one hundred and twenty instead of eighty upon liquors manufactured from imported material.

Mr. STEVENS. When we come to that, if it is thought proper to increase it, it can be done. All I have to say at present is that raising the duty as much as we raise the tax affords the same protection, and the committee have deemed that sufficient. But that question is not now before us.

I move to insert in the second section after the word "circumstances" the words, "the value whereof may be diminished by delay of sale;" so that it will read:

Provided, however, That where, owing to the perishable nature of the property seized, expense of storage, or other circumstances, the value whereof may be diminished by delay of sale, the owner thereof may, if he so choose, apply to the assessor of the district, who shall, if he deem it expedient that the property so seized should be sold, appraise or have the same appraised under his direction and control, and the owner may give bond or bonds in an amount equal to the appraised value, with such surties as the assessor shall adjudge good and sufficient, which shall be by him transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be held and collected, or any part thereof, or surrendered in accordance with the final judgment, order, or decree of the court having jurisdiction of the case; &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved to insert the words "whether of American or foreign production;" so that it will read:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, in addition to the duties heretofore imposed by law, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on spirits distilled from grain or other materials, whether of American or foreign production, imported from foreign countries, of first proof, a duty of forty cents on each and every gallon; and no lower rate of duty shall be levied or collected than the basis of first proof, and shall be increased in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of first proof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Several verbal corrections were also agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the committee rise. The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes; and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the bill be made a special order for the day when its consideration shall be resumed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JAMES KEENAN, DECEASED.

Mr. DAWSON moved that the memorial and papers relating to the claim of James Keenan, deceased, late United States consul at Hong Kong, for expenses incurred in relieving shipwrecked American citizens, &c., be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. As there seems to be a general disposition to have more time to examine the revenue bill which has been under consideration to-day, I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. STEVENS. I will say to the gentleman that I am willing that the bill shall go over until Monday; but we might meet to-morrow for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of March 3, 1863, a copy of the record of proceedings, in the case of Commander Robert Handy of the Navy, of a naval board assembled at Brooklyn, New York; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FOOT presented the memorial of Charles F. Anderson, praying for remuneration for the design and plans of the present new wings of the Capitol, including the interior arrangement of the new Halls of Congress, with their surrounding corridors, offices, and galleries, and for expenses incurred in repeated journeys from New York; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WILSON presented the memorial of Peter Cooper, of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the clause which allows a person to obtain exemption from the draft by the payment of $300; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of the city of Boston, and a petition of merchants and others of Marblehead, Massachusetts, praying that aid may be granted to the South American Steamship Company, for the purpose of establishing postal communication by steam vessels with the countries of South America; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the memorial of Helen M. Stansbury, widow of Major Howard Stansbury, of the corps of Topographical Engineers of the United States Army, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS. I present a memorial of the officers of the Agricultural Society of the State of New York, and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read if there be no objection.

Mr. COLLAMER. It will be a considerable business if we begin to read all the memorials that come in. It will take a great deal of time. The rule is that the member presenting a memorial shall state its contents.

Mr. HARRIS. Perhaps I owe an apology to the Senate. It was handed to me this moment at the door, with a request that I should present it. I have not read it. It is a resolution of that society.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection. It will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

NEW YORK STATE AGRICULTURAL ROOMS,
ALBANY, NEW YORK, January 7, 1864.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, officers of the New York State Agricultural Society, beg leave respectfully to represent that the following resolutions were adopted by the executive committee of the society on the 15th of September last, namely:

Resolved, That this society regards as a subject of great importance to the industrial and agricultural interests of the United States the project of Dr. D. J. McGowan, for the appointment by the national Government of a commission, composed of scientific men and practical agriculturists, to visit and explore eastern Asia with a view to acquire information bearing upon arts and manufactures and the processes of agriculture there pursued; and to obtain and transmit seeds, plants, and animals, the cultivation and propagation of which would be likely to add to the valuable products of our farms.

Resolved, That the New York State Agricultural Society heartily commends the subject to the favorable action of the Government as likely to result in substantial benefit to every section of the country.

The undersigned, on behalf of the New York State Agricultural Society, beg leave to memorialize your honorable bodies for the enactment of such law or resolution as will best accomplish the objects of the resolution; and, as in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That twenty-five hundred copies of the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in addition to those already ordered, be printed for the use of the Commissioner.

TROOPS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 35.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 35) to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to appropriate $700,612 13, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry into effect the act approved March 25, 1862, "to secure to the officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri, their pay, bounty, and pension." In the payment of this money, it is to be paid directly to the officers or soldiers by whom the services were rendered, or to their personal representatives, or to their agents appointed by powers of attorney, and no assignment of any sum due to any officer or soldier is to be valid. Any person holding a power of attorney authorizing the receipt by him of the amount to be paid to any officer or soldier may, upon making and filing an affidavit to the effect that he is acting in the premises purely as agent, without personal interest, and that he will pay over the amount received either to the soldier or (in his absence) to his wife or children, for their benefit, is to be entitled to receive such amount.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise to ask the Senator from Missouri for some explanation of this bill. It proposes to make a large appropriation.

Mr. HENDERSON. This question was frequently discussed here prior to the time when the Senator became a member of this body. It was discussed here in 1862, and also in 1863. In the beginning of the difficulties in Missouri, while General Lyon was at St. Louis in command of the Western department, at the time of the uprising of the rebels in our State, he called out a large number of citizen soldiers in order to check the progress of the rebellion in the State. A great many men responded immediately to that call, and remained in the service during the summer of 1861. Afterwards, some time in July or August, General Frémont was sent to the department, put in command, and he continued the policy that had been previously adopted by General Lyon, and a large number of troops of a similar character were called out by General Frémont. At that early period we had very poor facilities, indeed, for mustering in troops according to the forms required by the military regulations of the United States, and we were equally badly off for the forms of mustering out. In fact there was but little time for formalities. In consequence of the informality of the papers, the mustering-in rolls and the mustering-out rolls of these troops, the paymasters of the department refused to pay the troops, even though they had been in service for six months, and many of them were in for longer than six months. The battle at Booneville was fought by troops of this character. A large number of them were engaged in the battle at Springfield, in which General Lyon fell. They did very important service in the State of Missouri. A great many of them I think were from the State of Iowa, and numbers of them were from the State of Kansas.

In the spring of 1862 a bill was introduced into the other House by my colleague, [Mr. BLAIR,] providing that the troops should be paid notwithstanding the informality of the mustering rolls. The paymaster of that department, who is now the acting Paymaster General, Mr. Andrews, reported that it would take some two or three million dollars, he thought, to pay the troops whose rolls were being presented in an informal manner. The chairman of the Military Committee in this body, the Senator from Massachusetts, presented a bill to postpone all payments under that act. It was amended, however, so as to provide for the appointment by the War Department of a commission to proceed to the western departments, and to examine into all these claims. That commission was appointed, composed of three or four very competent and able gentlemen, so far as I know, and they examined into the claims and reported the amount due, reaching I think to the sum of $800,000.

It is true, at the time of the passage of the act I did not think it would take such an amount of money; but it turns out that the paymasters in the western departments paid none of those troops at all; and the whole of them were left to be paid under that bill. After it was introduced into Congress they refused to pay any whatever, and remitted the whole matter to the commission that was appointed under the act of Congress. So far as I am advised, they have acted with a great deal of prudence and discretion, and they report that they have rejected a large number of those claims. How that is I cannot tell. Their report is here, and if any Senator desires it, it may be read. It was carefully examined in the House, as I understand. It was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] has examined it carefully in connection with the report of the commission, and he tells me it is a bill that ought to be passed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the bill appropriate only the amount awarded by the commission?

Mr. HENDERSON. It is only for the amount awarded.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know anything about this bill; but I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri if it has any connection with a bill which was passed some time ago on his motion, where an exhibit was made of the number of troops it would cover, I think amounting to about twenty-five hundred. I remember that he showed me a report at the time we passed some bill in relation to the Western department, showing precisely how many troops were to be paid; and according to my recollection the number was about twenty-five hundred.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no recollection of having shown the Senator any such report; but perhaps his recollection on the subject is better than mine. If he will recall to my memory at what time and under what circumstances I did so, I may remember it. I could not have presented twenty-five hundred as the number of home guards in the State of Missouri, because I was perfectly aware that they amounted to a great deal more than that from the number of regiments there were in the service. We have had various propositions here in regard to Missouri troops, and perhaps the Senator has confounded some other measure with this one. Surely under no circumstances could I have been so much mistaken in regard to the number of troops that were employed by General Lyon and by General Fremont in the whole Western department, including the States of Missouri, Iowa, and Kansas, as to state it at twenty-five hundred. However, I know nothing about this subject except what I obtain from information furnished to me from time to time from the Western department by military men who were engaged in this service. I never knew anything of it myself except simply the fact that large numbers of meritorious men, many of whom lost their lives, rendered the service and never have been paid up to this day in consequence of the mere informality in their mustering rolls.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The troops of Kansas who served in the same way that the troops of Missouri served, have been paid by the action of Congress. I know that these troops served, and served gallantly, and I hope there will be no hesitation in paying them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What committee did this bill come from? Has it been to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a House bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to offer an amendment. I propose to insert after the word "valid" in the sixteenth line the words "such payments to be made by paymasters of the United States Army;" so as to direct that this money shall be paid in the regular order of business, and under the superintendence and control of officers who are under bonds to perform their duty properly to the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that will make it more expensive.

Mr. GRIMES. Oh, no; it cannot.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the payments under this bill could not be otherwise made than by regular paymasters.

Mr. GRIMES. Then there can be no earthly objection to the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. None whatever, except that there is no necessity for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT put the question on the amendment, and declared that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask for a division.

Mr. BROWN. I think it very likely that this bill will have to go back to the House anyhow. For one, I am in favor of the adoption of the amendment, because I have already heard canvassed the idea of getting up a new set of paymasters to do this work, and I think we have plenty of paymasters in the service now.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I withdraw the call for a division.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to submit a motion to strike out the second proviso of the bill, and upon that point I send to the desk a memorial which will state the grounds why it should be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Secretary read the proviso, as follows:

Provided further, however, That any person holding a power of attorney authorizing the receipt by him of the amount to be paid to any officer or soldier may, upon making and filing an affidavit to the effect that he is acting in the premises purely as agent, without personal interest, and that he will pay over the amount received either to the soldier or (in his absence) to his wife or children, for their benefit, be entitled to receive such amount.

Mr. HENDERSON. I now desire the Secretary to read the memorial I send to the desk. It states the facts on which my motion is founded.

The Secretary read, as follows:

To the honorable Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States from Missouri:

The undersigned desire most respectfully to call your consideration to the incorporating of what is known and called the Cox amendment, in the bill recently passed in the lower House, making appropriation for the paying off of the home guard claims of Missouri, and to state our conviction and knowledge of the great injustice which must necessarily accrue to innocent parties, while we cannot perceive the least benefit or advantage resulting to any one.

We submit that in our opinion nine tenths of the whole of the home guard claims are held by the original parties, while a few, in order to raise the necessary daily subsistence for their families—caused by the delay or failure of an early appropriation—have disposed of their claims on the most advantageous terms to themselves, a large portion of which have been received at par by merchants, who subsidized the families of the soldiers while doing their duty in the field; and many liberal-minded agents have advanced money in part of these claims, with no other compensation than the ordinary interest of ten per cent. per annum, and such fees as were agreed upon for the prosecution of said claims, and with no other security for the money advanced than the ordinary power of attorney for the collection of the same; while many others have purchased these claims at from seventy-five to ninety cents on the dollar, and, in many instances, the purchaser will not realize more than the ordinary interest on his investment. And we know of many instances where the purchaser will not realize six per cent. per annum on his investment. While we would guard against the great injustice to the purchaser, we would not be blind to the interest of the soldiers holding the claims, who have labored, and toiled, and offered their lives as a sacrifice on the altar of their country.

To them it presents other hardships and serious inconveniences which, if it becomes a law, must necessarily deprive many of the benefits of their just dues; as in thousands of instances the claims run from fifteen dollars to fifty dollars, and whole companies have joined in powers of attorney to agents to collect and account for them at ten per cent. If new powers of attorney and new affidavits have in each case to be made out, it will subject the parties to a cost of from twenty to thirty per cent., depending upon the amount of each claim; and as each party cannot personally be present, as a matter of course new powers of attorney and affidavits must of a necessity be made.

Some of these men have since joined the service and been killed in battle; and their families are looking for this small income to relieve their pressing wants.

Many who have disposed of their claims have removed to different States and sections of the country.

We further suggest that it is placing an unnecessary and onerous restriction upon their rights as citizens, which ought not and never should be tolerated by American legislation.

And we would further respectfully ask that the honorable members will use such exertions as, in their superior judgment, may defeat the incorporation of such portions of this amendment as will operate to the injustice of your constituency.

Most respectfully, your obedient servants,

Mr. HENDERSON. That memorial was sent to me. In regard to the truth of the statements contained in it I know nothing. I know some of the merchants who signed it. They are mostly confined to the city of St. Louis. My colleague is much better acquainted with the character of those gentlemen than I am. I know some of them, and I know them to be very honorable and high-minded gentlemen and good merchants. There are many of the firms mentioned that I do not know; there are some sixty or seventy in all, I think. My colleague can state what he knows in reference to them. I know nothing about the merits of the amendment that I have submitted. If they have advanced money upon the claims, and the statements made by them be true, the amendment ought to be adopted. If, on the other hand, any amount of speculation has taken place in these claims in Missouri, or in Iowa, or elsewhere, it ought not to be adopted. That is my opinion. I have felt it incumbent on me, after having received the communication, to lay it before the Senate and let them be heard. My colleague is better acquainted with the character of the men, and I hope he will state the facts. I believe that the memorial is in his hands and that he has examined the matter.

Mr. BROWN. I have been informed by Representatives in the other House that this provision was placed upon the bill without due consideration. That it will operate as an injustice to some parties, I am satisfied. How far the general tenor of its operation may be right or wrong, Senators must judge for themselves. As the bill shows upon its face, due notice has been given for more than a year past that these claims were being investigated and would be paid. On the strength of it, many of the claims have been realized; some of them at ruinous rates to the parties; others of them, as I believe, at very fair rates. The House of Representatives placed this provision on the bill which will preclude all previous assignments taking effect, which will destroy the value of all powers of attorney, and in some instances, where soldiers have left powers of attorney and have died, will totally invalidate the claims.

The memorial which has come up from some of my constituency is signed by men of very good character; and I was personally appealed to when recently in St. Louis by gentlemen who had made advances, whose character I know, and who did it in a fair business way. I am not prepared to say how far that may have gone, although I do not think any large proportion of the claims has gone out of the hands of the original holders. It is a matter that I feel no disposition to press one way or the other.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

A message was afterwards received from the House of Representatives announcing that the House concurred in the amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 50) to authorize the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (No. 143) to amend the law prescribing the articles to be admitted into the mails of the United States;

A bill (No. 144) to indemnify the owners of the British schooner Glen; and

A bill (No. 145) for the relief of the heirs of Noah Wiswall.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following bill and joint resolution; which were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

A bill (S. No. 57) declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, therein named; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 15) amendatory of the joint resolution "to supply in part deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounties to volunteers."

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. WILSON. I move that we now proceed to the consideration of the enrollment bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the order of the day, which does not come up regularly until one o'clock, will now be taken up. The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; the question being on an amendment proposed by Mr. NESMITH, to add the following as an additional section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That any drafted person who shall be declared to be exempt by reason of physical disability, and whose annual gains, profits, or income, as ascertained by the provisions of the "Act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, and to pay interest on the public debt," approved July 1, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, exceed the sum of $1,000, including all deductions authorized to be made in said act, such person shall pay the sum of $300 to the person authorized to receive commutation money from drafted persons not exempted; and it shall be the duty of the provost marshal of each district to transmit to the collector of internal revenue of such district the names and residences of all persons drafted and declared to be exempt by reason of physical disability; and if any drafted person so declared to be exempt, and whose annual gains, profits, or income exceed the sum of $1,000, to be ascertained as aforesaid, shall neglect or refuse for the period of ten days after his name shall have been transmitted to the collector of internal revenue to pay the sum of $300 as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the collector of internal revenue to collect said sum in the manner provided by law for the collection of income tax in default, together with all the penalties and costs therein provided, and to pay over the said $300 to the person authorized as aforesaid; and such drafted person so declared to be exempt, by reason of physical disability, who shall pay the sum of $300 within ten days after his name shall have been transmitted to the collector of internal revenue, shall not again be liable to draft during the time for which he was drafted; but if such person shall neglect or refuse to pay said sum for the period of ten days as aforesaid, he shall be liable to draft whenever the President of the United States shall call for men from the district in which he resides; and it shall be the duty of the collector of internal revenue to transmit to the provost marshal the names and residences of all such persons required to pay the sum of $300 as aforesaid, who shall neglect or refuse, for the period of ten days, to pay said sum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the bill by striking out the fourth section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That any person enrolled under the provisions of the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, or who may hereafter be so enrolled, may furnish at any time an acceptable substitute who is not liable to draft; and such person so furnishing a substitute shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute shall have been accepted.

Mr. HOWE. I understand that the purpose of this section is to enable any man whose name is borne upon the rolls to find some other man who is not liable at that time to be enrolled, put his name on the roll instead of his own, and strike his own off.

Mr. WILSON. To send him into the Army.

Mr. HOWE. And to put his name upon the rolls.

Mr. WILSON. No.

Mr. HOWE. Well, if the Senator pleases, to send him into the Army without putting his name on the rolls. I supposed his name would be put upon the rolls before he went into the Army; but it is to send him into the Army, and as a compensation for that the man's own name is to be taken from the roll. Probably I am not mistaken on that point.

The classes from among which these individuals are to be taken are, I suppose, four: first, men who are over forty-five and not liable to be enrolled for that reason; second, men who are under twenty and not liable to be enrolled for that reason; third, aliens, who are not liable to be enrolled on account of their alienage; and fourth, those who are now in the service, but who have less than six months to serve and have served two years. To this last class, which is much the largest one, the Government already offers a large bounty. "All that the man whose name is borne upon the rolls has to do, is to do a little missionary work, to look up the individual and to induce him, with the aid of the $400 which the Government offers, to reenlist in the service; and for doing that missionary labor his name is to be taken from the rolls, and he is to be no longer liable to draft. That is a sort of substituted service. Certain classes are allowed to do missionary work instead of military service. It seems to me that the Government offers a bounty which will secure the reenlistment of all of this class who are likely to enlist at all, and I do not see how you are ever to determine how much the individual who looks up the man does to procure his reenlistment. He has the benefit of the $400 which is paid by the Government. If a man reenlists, I should attribute it to the inducements of that bounty rather than to the arguments used by that missionary. I do not see why he should be paid for that work, or should be exempted from military service on account of it. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, but four members seconding the call.

The amendment was rejected—yeas four, noes not counted.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the fourth section by striking out the last three words, "have been accepted," and inserting in lieu of them the words "not be liable to draft." The clause will then read:

Such person so furnishing a substitute shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute shall not be liable to draft.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the effect of that amendment, may I ask the Senator from Wisconsin? How does it change the bill as it stands now?

Mr. HOWE. As the bill now stands it will enable a person to go into the Army, pick up one who has but six months to serve, and get him to reenlist, and thereby in six months the soldier would be liable to be drafted himself, but by getting him to reenlist the man who procures his reenlistment is exempt from service for three years. The amendment, if adopted, will exempt him from liability to draft, or liability to be enrolled, for just the term for which his substitute was exempted from liability to enrollment; no more.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I offer an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved on the 3d day of March, 1863, as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act, is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to propose an amendment to the section which was adopted by the Senate on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in order. The Senate having agreed to that section in that form, it is not now in order to amend it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not to add to it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not to add to it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I presume it will be in order when the bill has been reported to the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; it will then be open to amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to submit an amendment, as my own view of what we ought to do, as an additional section to the bill; but if there shall be much opposition to it, I shall withdraw it:

And be it further enacted, That section eleven of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of said section after the word "enacted," and inserting the following, to wit: "that all persons enrolled shall be subject to be called into the military service of the United States, and to continue in service for two years unless sooner discharged; and when called into service they shall receive a bounty of $100 each, and be placed on the same footing in all respects as volunteers for three years or during the war, as now provided by law."

Without occupying much of the time of the Senate, I wish simply to say that I think if the amendment is adopted thousands of men will themselves go into the service who would decline to go in for three years; that it will lighten the burdens of the draft; and that a draft for two years, putting the drafted men into the old regiments, will be all that the country needs. If, at the end of a year or two years, we wish for more men, we can draft new men. When you enlist a man, I care not what the time is, if he voluntarily enlists, you may enlist him for three years if he chooses; but when you go to the people and say to them, "You must go into the service," we ought to make it just as light as we can upon the people, consistent with the duty we owe to the country; and I believe that if we draft for two years it will answer all the purposes, and will lighten the burden of the draft to the people of the country, and will be effective to the Government. I desire, if this be adopted, to put it after the eleventh section of the bill; between that and the twelfth section.

Mr. CONNESS. It appears to me that there are two or three, if not more, good reasons why this amendment should not be adopted. It is a publication to the rebellion, or to those having the control and direction of it, that we do not intend more than to carry on a war by fragmentary efforts; and we do it in the face of the fact that we are laying increased burdens upon the country in the shape of bounties for the reenlistment of veteran volunteers. We are now asked to provide for discharging veterans when they are becoming most useful. That it would have the effect of making the draft seem lighter, more acceptable, I cannot perceive, nor do I believe it. I think that the drafted man will not consent any more readily because his term is two years than if it were three. Besides, the principle upon which this draft is made is that the Government requires the service and that the citizen is compelled to yield it. I hope, sir, that the amendment will not be adopted. I regret very much that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has offered it. I am quite certain that it does not meet the views of the War Department. I am quite certain that it will be an injurious provision if adopted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the Senator from California. I think that the Army in its moral power will lose half its force if it is understood that the men are going in for two years only. It does not make the burden in any degree lighter upon those who are called to go into the service, so far, probably, as the present war is concerned; but to know that our Army is filled up with men for three years is giving it power and efficiency as an army. I know very well that the rebels in fighting this battle against us, in the very movements of their troops, have made calculations upon the time when the terms of our soldiers were about to expire. I know, too, that in regard to our power, so far as it has any influence abroad, it is well to know that these troops are enlisted for three years; for what complications may possibly arise no one knows, even with foreign nations. I trust that our relations will be peaceful. I hope and I expect they will be; but as the most certain mode of having those relations peaceful, we not only for the purpose of putting down this rebellion want our troops enlisted for the three years, but we want it understood abroad that this Army of ours that is fighting these battles is an army of veterans well drilled for the service.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from California reminds us of the desires of the War Department. Sir, we are not here to legislate entirely on questions like this according to the desires of the Department. Congress is master of the Department, not their servant. On matters of administration I am desirous to legislate in accordance with the wishes of the War Department; but upon Congress, and Congress alone, rests the responsibility of determining how we shall raise troops, and for what length of time they shall serve. The Senator from California and other Senators have spoken during this debate of the importance of making the enrollment act more effective. I, too, am in favor of making the act more effective. We are making one of the most stringent acts for drafting ever enacted. Certain provisions of the original act, framed to lighten the burdens of the draft upon the more dependent portions of the people, we propose to repeal. Great abuses have grown up in the administration of the act under those provisions of the act which were intended to lighten its burdens. It is thought, too, that the needs of the country require that these provisions should be stricken out.

We put the drafted men into old regiments, where they are fit for duty at once. It will lighten the burdens of the draft to reduce the time from three to two years. So believing, I submit this proposition, confident that its adoption will answer the needs of the country, lighten the burdens of the people, and bring men more readily into the public service. When a man volunteers he does it from choice, and the time is not important; but when the Government forces a man into the Army the burden is more or less according to the time of service required. The burden is measured by time, and the reduction of the time from three years to two diminishes the reluctance of drafted men to enter the service.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to one or two considerations in regard to this matter. A short time ago the President called for volunteers for three years; as the draft law then stood, a man drafted was to go for three years, and it was understood that if the quota of the several States was not filled up by volunteering it would be so filled up by draft, and that both the volunteer and the drafted man would serve for three years. Many men came forward as volunteers into the service for three years. I ask, now, the Senator from Massachusetts if it is desirable, and if it would be fair, to alter the law so that the drafted man should go for two years after men have been induced to volunteer for three years? Is it not better for the present to keep both alike, and, as we have drafted men heretofore for three years, not make the proposed change which would introduce an inequality between the volunteer service and the draft service? In my own judgment it would be better to preserve uniformity. It may be that the men drafted will not be wanted for more than two years; but as we have begun to draft for three years, in my judgment, for the present at least, it is better to keep them in that way.

Several States have filled up their quotas already: the State of Iowa has; the State of Vermont has; the State of New Hampshire has very nearly done so, and she will fill it without any draft; and those men all go for three years. Undoubtedly many men have been induced to volunteer because they supposed they might be drafted; but now, if they see that the draft law is so altered that they might have escaped a year's service by refusing to volunteer and by waiting to be drafted, perhaps they will not feel any the better for that. I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts that we had now better let the term of service remain as it is. I might agree with him if we had not undertaken the policy heretofore.

Mr. WILSON. There is something in the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire so far as it is applied to the simple fulfillment of what has been called for by the President; but many of the persons who have been enlisted have received $600 or $700 bounty, while if they were drafted they would receive but $100. As we were making this act, as I supposed, for a longer period than this special draft, and we were very likely to have another following it, I thought the mere fact that some States have filled or will fill their quotas should not prevent our fixing what we may regard as the proper term of service. I believe most of the States will fill up their quotas by the 1st of March under the bounty act. I hope so, at any rate; but I thought we had better make this bill so that it would fall as lightly as possible on the people of the country and at the same time answer all the purposes that the Government desires to accomplish. I desire, above all things, in the first place to take care of the interests of the Government and of the country, and in the next place to make this act bear just as lightly as possible upon the mass of our people.

Mr. CLARK. If the States fill their quotas by volunteering this act will not fall on the country at all.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator that we have provided for giving the bounties up to the 1st of March. After the 1st of March, supposing the States shall have filled their quotas, if the Government wants more troops immediately, the Government will call for a draft unless we authorize the Government to go on and offer bounties.

Mr. CLARK. I was going to say further that if the quotas are not filled, or if we are obliged to call for new men after they are filled, I submit that it would be better for the volunteers who have volunteered for three years than the drafted men also should go for three years, so that the man who has held back and is finally drafted shall not find that he has gained a year by so doing. Let him go into the service for the same time.

Mr. CONNESS. There is a great deal of force to my mind in the suggestion made by the Senator from New Hampshire; but I wish to say a word in response to the Senator from Massachusetts in regard to his entire independence in matters of legislation of the Department that relates most directly to that legislation, as in this case the War Department does. It was scarcely necessary for us to be told by the Senator from Massachusetts that Congress governs this whole matter and has the right to do as it shall please. But it appears to me that there is not great wisdom in the utterance of the Senator from Massachusetts when he tells us that he does not care anything for what the War Department wants; in other words, when he refuses to avail himself of the information and knowledge in possession of the Department who are carrying on this war.

Let me illustrate, Mr. President, just for a moment. The General-in-Chief, in a conference to which I was a party, and to which I believe the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs was a party, stated that they are having reports from the commanders in the field constantly touching the condition of the armies in the field, their efficiency, and so on, and that those commanders have in some instances stated in communications to the headquarters, to the General-in-Chief, that a veteran soldier was worth two recruits, two new men; others that they were worth three; and some estimate a veteran as worth ten raw recruits, and they go through all the intermediate proportions. They would sooner have one veteran trained soldier who was injured to camp life, who had been under fire again and again, than ten new men in carrying on this war. It appears to me that that is a fact full of suggestion to us. It appears to me that to undertake to legislate against the fullness of information contained in that fact would be simply legislation without wisdom.

This is the kind of dictation that I am in favor of submitting to in legislation, and that I think it is wise to submit to, from the War Department. Suppose the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. SUMNER,] should undertake to carry on the business of his committee without consulting with the State Department upon grave matters. I apprehend he would scarcely do that, or find it convenient to do it. Although I have the profoundest confidence in the ability and faithfulness of the Senator from Massachusetts who stands at the head of the Committee on Military Affairs, I think he can be served and his knowledge may be increased by full consultation with the War Department, and by the adoption of the information and wisdom that is gained by experience in that Department.

In conclusion I will say that when the great want that is felt in the field is the want of veteran soldiers, we should not now at this time advertise ourselves to our enemies as simply calling together raw levies for a short period of time, nor deprive ourselves by our deliberate act of a year's service of veteran soldiers when, in my opinion, there is no corresponding gain to be found anywhere.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator from California that the information to which the Senator has alluded is in possession of the members of the Military Committee. Nobody doubts that a veteran soldier is of more value to the country than a raw recruit. The only question for us to consider, I think, is this: whether the country will be well served and all its interests cared for by drafting men and putting them into the old regiments for two years. I think they would, and I have therefore submitted this motion. A suggestion has been made here the force of which I certainly feel, and I feel it the more because my own State has not fully completed its quota, and it may be supposed that I press this matter on that account. I must confess that such a thought never entered my mind before. I have looked at the draft, not in relation to its immediate action, but as a system applying to the whole country with the liability of several drafts. As such a suggestion has been made, however, I shall withdraw this amendment. If the quota of my own State were full to-day I should certainly ask a vote of the Senate upon it; but I would not do anything that would look as if I were actuated by local interest. I would give nothing to my own State that I would not give to every other part of the country.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator should not withdraw his amendment for that reason.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to move an amendment to the fourth section of the bill to make it conform to the language contained in the section introduced by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] in relation to the employment of substitutes by taking those who are in the service of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts if he withdraws the amendment he proposed as an additional section?

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment is withdrawn, and the Senator from Wisconsin moves—

Mr. COWAN. I desire to renew the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts if he withdraws it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to add by way of proviso to the fourth section the following:

But no person in the service of the United States shall become a substitute to serve in any regiment or company except among the troops of the State in which he originally enlisted, or from which he was drafted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether under the existing law a person who is exempted receives pay and mileage for attending the board of enrollment. If so, I think it ought to be repealed, and I shall offer an amendment to cut off such pay and mileage. He appears to claim a personal exemption; it is a personal privilege; and I do not think the Government ought to pay his expenses for attending the board of enrollment. I merely ask for information on that point.

Mr. WILSON. I believe it is so. I have got that impression. I will look at the law.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is so, and I will state the reason why it is so. That law provided no mode by which the question of exempting an infirm man, or one wanting in physical ability, could be settled at his home. We had such an arrangement in the State laws for drafting, but there was no such provision in the law of last year. It was thought to be unadvisable to have an inspection by anybody of a person at home privately. The enrolling officers were to enroll all men between certain ages, and then if they should be drafted they were to come before the board for them to decide upon their physical ability. As it thus compelled people to make a journey to get to the board before their physical ability could be determined upon, the law provided for paying them their traveling expenses. The question now is, whether we will still leave that provision in the law. Even if a man has a leg off, he is enrolled, and there is no mode in which he can settle the question of his physical ability except by making a journey to where the board of enrollment hold their meetings. Is he to make that journey and then go home again having his physical ability determined, and be subjected to all this expense which there is no possible mode of avoiding unless we provide a way for his inspection at home?

MR. WILSON. By the sixteenth section of the act of last year it is provided—

"That all drafted persons reporting at the place of rendezvous shall be allowed travel and pay from their places of residence, and all persons discharged at the place of rendezvous shall be allowed travel and pay to their places of residence."

By that provision, persons who appear before the board of enrollment receive their traveling expenses. The Senator from Ohio will recollect, as stated by the Senator from Vermont, that the enrolling officers enroll everybody. They do not omit the names of men who they know will be exempted; they have no right to do so, because we thought they should be brought before the board, as we proposed to make an enrollment of the whole people. It was therefore thought to be just, where we asked a man to travel some miles to go before the board, that his traveling should be paid.

MR. SHERMAN. I am also informed—I give the charges as they are made to me—that the grossest frauds have been practiced under this provision; that persons who have come before the board of enrollment and established their exemption were required to sign papers, in some cases without knowing precisely what they were, and those papers were really blank receipts for the amount of their per diem allowance and mileage, and some of the officers of the board have drawn this money, which was not called for by the persons to whom it was due nor paid them at the time. The person who gets his papers of exemption never thinks anything more of the matter. Under this system, I am told, the grossest frauds have been practiced; to what extent, I do not know. I think it would be better, if a person establishes a personal privilege exempting him from military service, to make him do it at his own expense, and sometimes, at least, upon evidence, without requiring his personal appearance. I see no reason why a man ought to be required to travel a hundred miles to prove that he has but one leg. I think the evidence ought to be satisfactory evidence. I will not now offer an amendment on the subject; but I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Military Committee to it, in the hope that he will rectify the matter.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. Senators desiring a separate vote or division on any amendment made in Committee of the Whole will indicate it at this time, and the question will then be taken on concurring in the amendments that are not excepted.

MR. ANTHONY. I should like to except the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] I wish to offer an amendment to it.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be excepted.

MR. CLARK. I desire to except the amendment which I offered yesterday as a new section.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be reserved for a separate vote.

MR. SUMNER. Will it be in order to offer an amendment in the Senate?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will still be open to amendment after the Senate shall have concurred in or rejected the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

MR. CLARK. I desire a separate vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. NESMITH.]

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be reserved for a separate vote. The question now is on concurring in all the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, except such as have been indicated for a separate vote.

The remainder of the amendments were concurred in.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The first excepted amendment will be read.

The Secretary read it, which was the amendment offered by Mr. SHERMAN, to insert the following as a new section:

"That any person enrolled and drafted into the military service of the United States may furnish an acceptable substitute, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War. That if such substitute is not liable to draft, the person furnishing him shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute is not liable to draft, not exceeding the term for which he was drafted; and if such substitute is liable to draft, the name of the person furnishing him shall again be placed on the roll, and shall be liable to draft on future calls. And any person now in the military or naval service of the United States, not physically disqualified, who has so served more than one year, and whose term of unexpired service shall not at the time of substitution exceed six months, may be employed as a substitute to serve in the troops of the State in which he enlisted; and if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procurement of a substitute, under the provisions of the act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall operate only to relieve such person from draft on that call, and his name shall be retained on the roll, and he shall be subject to draft on future calls."

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, "Will the Senate concur in this amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?"

MR. ANTHONY. I desire to offer an amendment to that amendment. It is the same that I offered in Committee of the Whole. It is to insert at the end of the amendment the following proviso:

Provided, That no person who has been drafted and furnished a substitute or paid commutation, as herein provided, shall again be liable to draft until the present enrollment shall be exhausted; but this exemption shall not exceed the term for which such person shall have been drafted.

The object of this proviso is merely to equalize the burdens of the draft, and let them fall as far as possible upon all alike; that one man shall not be drawn twice and pay commutation twice, while others have not been drawn once. It does not relieve any man from service under the draft, but only requires every man to be drafted once before one man is drafted twice. I do not see how it makes the least difference to the Government; and I thought when it was voted upon in committee it was not perfectly understood by the Senate.

MR. SHERMAN. If this amendment should be adopted it will defeat the entire purpose of my amendment, and I would rather see the whole of it fail. If the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island should be adopted, everybody who is drafted will do as they did under the old draft. They will pay the $300, and there will be an end of it; and the effect will be, no draft will be made. Any man with $300 can substantially relieve himself from military service, because the enrollment will not be exhausted for a long time. I think it is giving too much effect to the payment of money. It is substantially going back to the old system. If that amendment should be adopted, I think we had better defeat the whole thing, and let it stand under the old law. That is my impression.

MR. ANTHONY. I certainly cannot understand it so. No man is relieved from the draft under this amendment. It decides only the question of precedence, only who shall serve first. If I am drafted and pay $300, then I am not to be drafted again until the Senator from Ohio is drafted; and when he is drafted and has paid his $300, then I am drafted again. It does not relieve a man from the draft; it does not diminish the number of those from whom the Army is to be recruited; but it only settles the question which shall come first; whether a man who has already paid once shall be drafted before a man who has not paid once. I do not wish to defeat the object of the Senator's amendment. It seems to me this proposition carries out the object of that amendment. It equalizes the burden.

MR. SHERMAN. The object of my amendment is simply to prevent people from paying $300 to relieve themselves from military service. If the effect of the payment of $300 is simply to restore a man's name to the roll, he is then likely to go and procure a substitute who is not subject to draft. That is the purpose of my amendment. The principal purpose is to make it an object, to hold out an inducement, to men who are drafted to hire substitutes from those not subject to draft; from among the veteran soldiers, for instance. This amendment would substantially defeat the purpose of my amendment.

I must confess I take less interest in this matter since the Senate, by a decided majority, voted to retain the $300 exemption clause. It seems to me the amount is too small, considering the comparative values of money and labor. Men will come forward and pay the $300 without objection and without feeling it, and in that way avoid military service. The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island would still more induce people to pay $300, because it would operate to exempt them from draft as long as any one remains on the enrollment list. That may be two or three years. I think it is not just or fair. The argument I made the other day, it seems to me, is conclusive; it is certainly satisfactory to my mind; and that is this: that if I, being drafted, employ some one else who is subject to draft, I ought to take the place of that person whom I employ; take the chances for a draft; and if I am drafted the second time, it is no greater hardship than if the man who occupies my place in the Army was drafted likewise. I wish to throw all the obstructions possible in the way of commuting military service by the payment of money. The obstructions I proposed were, first, that the person drafted and paying money should go back upon the enrollment list, and take his chances for a future draft; and second, to increase the amount of commutation. The Senate having rejected the second branch of my proposition, there is no virtue in it except the provision that is now sought to be modified by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The question being put, the amendment to the amendment was declared to be agreed to.

MR. SHERMAN. If it is not too late, I should like to take the sense of the Senate by yeas and nays upon the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island to my amendment.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will not treat the question as concluded by declaring the vote in the affirmative. On this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. Under his amendment what would a man gain by paying $300?

MR. SHERMAN. He gains all that he ought to gain; that is, he is relieved from immediate military service and goes back among the rest of the citizens to take his chance for future drafts. That is all he gains and all he ought to gain. It seems to me we ought not to make the effect of commutation so extensive as Senators desire it.

MR. LANE, of Kansas. Let me suppose an instance. The Senator's name and mine are in the box. The Senator is drawn and pays $300. My name remains in the box. His name goes back with mine, and he may be drawn again, and drawn again, and drawn again. It does seem to me that the provision is a very unjust one.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Hale, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Pomeroy, Powell, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Foot, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nesmith, Ramsey, Sherman, Ten Eyck, and Wade—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole as amended.

MR. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it the following:

And if a married person who labors for a livelihood at some trade or occupation, and not possessed of unincumbered property exceeding the value of $700, and whose yearly earnings or wages do not exceed $400, be drafted, he may in like manner pay $150, and thereupon shall be entitled to a like exemption.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole as it has been amended in the Senate.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment reserved for a separate vote will now be read.

The Secretary read it, which was the amendment offered by Mr. NESMITH, to insert as a new section the following:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That any drafted person who shall be declared to be exempt by reason of physical disability, and whose annual gains, profits, or income, as ascertained by the provisions of the "Act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, and to pay interest on the public debt," approved July 1, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, exceed the sum of $1,000, including all deductions authorized to be made in said acts, such person shall pay the sum of $300 to the person authorized to receive commutation money from drafted persons not exempted; and it shall be the duty of the provost marshal of each district to transmit to the collector of internal revenue of such district the names and residences of all persons drafted and declared to be exempt by reason of physical disability; and if any drafted person so declared to be exempt, and whose annual gains, profits, or income, exceed the sum of $1,000, to be ascertained as aforesaid, shall neglect or refuse for the period of ten days after his name shall have been transmitted to the collector of internal revenue to pay the sum of $300 as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the collector of internal revenue to collect said sum in the manner provided by law for the collection of income tax in default, together with all the penalties and costs therein provided, and to pay over the said $300 to the person authorized as aforesaid; and such drafted person so declared to be exempt, by reason of physical disability, who shall pay the sum of $300 within ten days after his name shall have been transmitted to the collector of internal revenue, shall not again be liable to draft during the time for which he was drafted; but if such person shall neglect or refuse to pay said sum for the period of ten days as aforesaid, he shall be liable to draft whenever the President of the United States shall call for men from the district in which he resides; and it shall be the duty of the collector of internal revenue to transmit to the provost marshal the names and residences of all such persons, required to pay the sum of $300 as aforesaid, who shall neglect or refuse, for the period of ten days, to pay said sum.

Mr. CLARK. This is the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon, on which I desired a separate vote; and I did so that I might hear from him some explanation of the reasons for such an amendment. I suppose it passed in Committee of the Whole without much attention from the Senate, because inquiry was made of me afterwards whether it could have been understood.

One of the grounds of personal exemption, as I understand it, is, that a man is not fit for the Government service. He presents himself to the surgeon of the board, and is examined to see whether he is fit for the service. The board decide that he is not fit for the service, and they will not have him; and then by this amendment you call upon that man, if he has money, to pay taxes because the Government will not take him. Then, again, a man presents himself before the board who is afflicted with pulmonary consumption, or with phthisis, or some ailment which not only renders him entirely unfit for service, but makes him drag along his existence in suffering and affliction. Then, because the Government will not have him, or he cannot go by reason of these infirmities, if he is a rich man, you call on him to pay for that. In God's name, is it not enough for a man to be so afflicted? Such a man, as the Senator from Vermont suggests to me, owes no service. God has put it out of his power to render service, and man proposes to make him pay a tax for that affliction of Providence. Is not that the fair construction? I should be glad to hear from the Senator from Oregon some explanation of this provision.

Mr. NESMITH. After the vote taken yesterday, refusing to adopt the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs striking out the commutation clause, I ceased to take any interest in this bill. My amendment was then pending, having been offered some time previous. I did not propose to discuss it or explain it; neither do I care about explaining it now; but inasmuch as the Senator from New Hampshire has called on me for an explanation, I propose to state briefly what I consider to be the merits of the amendment.

I do not place it on the ground that a man is to be taxed $300 because God has afflicted him and deprived him of his health, but he is to be taxed $300 because he is rich and able to pay it. As an illustration, suppose the Senator from New Hampshire and I were neighbors, and he was worth $1,000,000. Suppose that he had been afflicted, not by God, but by the dentist, who had drawn out a few of his front teeth so that he could not masticate hard bread or bite a cartridge. I am not worth a dollar. I am drafted into the service. My personal service and all that I have on God's earth is taken for the benefit and use of the Government, while the Senator from New Hampshire, who has been afflicted, not by God, but by the dentist, is exempt from all service. His property, worth $1,000,000, is to be protected by this Government, and I with my musket on my shoulder must help to do it, and he is exempt from all liability.

That is the ground on which I place the amendment. I think it is equitable. I think it is just. There is no justice in pursuing a hypothesis in the prosecution of this war that compels the poor man, because he is poor and God has not afflicted him with some exempting cause, to render all the service and fight the battles of the country, while the millionaires, the men who are reveling in the most extravagant speculations and have more money than they know what to do with, are entirely exempt from doing anything for the cause of the country.

Mr. CLARK. I do not desire to detain the Senate; but the case mentioned, or the illustration drawn by the Senator from Oregon, would depend not so much upon the affliction to the person of the man who was exempt, as upon the consideration that the Government would not have him. Now, a man, as he says, may have lost his front teeth and the Government reject him. Why? Because he cannot bite his cartridge. That man may feel that affliction greatly, and if the Government would take the $300 and give him new teeth, perhaps he would be glad to go into the Army. [Laughter.]

I feel the force of all that was said by the Senator from Oregon in regard to the personal responsibility of a man who has property; but let me suggest to the Senator that this is not the way to reach it. The poor man is called upon for his personal service; the rich man for his personal service—nothing more. If the poor man has lost his teeth, he is exempted as well as the rich man. They stand upon an exact equality. The Government rejects them both because they are not serviceable in the Army, and for no other reason, as I understand it. The same is true of the man who has lost his finger. But there may be such hard cases as those to which I alluded before, where a man is absolutely afflicted and his life has become a burden, and he is called upon to pay by the provisions of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in this amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLARK. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have heard the remarks of the honorable Senator from Oregon in relation to this proposed amendment, and, if I understood him aright, he proposes to tax a man because he is rich. Now, why should you tax a man who is infirm and cannot render military duty, because he is rich, and not tax the man who is so old that he cannot render duty, because he is rich? What is the reason for the distinction? If the object of this amendment is to get money out of rich men, why should you pick out the lame, the halt, and the blind? Why should you not pick out the wealthy whose age secures them from the draft? They are the people generally who have most of the wealth. Why do you not reach such men? Why make this sort of strange and extraordinary distinction, requiring money from wealthy men provided they are infirm, and not requiring it from those who are too old to be drafted? Suppose we were to render this proposition into plain English and say, "We will lay a tax upon all lame men and all sick men whose income is above such an amount; but on all sound men whose income may be double that amount there shall be no such tax;" if it were put into plain English and made to read just so, would you find a man in this Senate to vote for it? And yet that is the very thing proposed here.

The real truth is, that when we ask men to pay money not in the form of taxes which are to be equal on all, it is only because they thereby get rid of or neglect some duty. We may make that a sort of income to us. We may insist on the payment of a considerable amount by men who neglect some duty. But, I ask, is the man who is lame, halt, or blind, and incapable of military service because the Government will not and cannot take him into that service, guilty of a neglect of any duty for which we should visit this punishment upon him, and mulct him in fines? I cannot see any reason, even if he does not owe any such military duty, why he should pay anything for it. If it is a tax, lay it on all who have the same income.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon to insert some clause in his amendment on this subject of physical disability, so as to qualify that expression. The suggestion I would make is to insert these words: "except for any physical disability which does not prevent his attending to ordinary business pursuits." There are a large class of physical disabilities that are allowed to exempt men from military service which do not in fact prevent them from being just as vigorous in all the ordinary avocations of life, farming, mechanics, and mechanical pursuits, as other men. Of course there would be great hardship in the case which has been stated, in requiring a person dying of the consumption to pay this amount. The language I have suggested would exclude all that class of cases.

Mr. COLLAMER. Who is to judge of that?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It would be a question to be decided by the board of enrollment, as a matter of course.

Mr. CLARK. Why is it that such men do not go into the service? It is because they are not permitted to do so by law and by the Government itself, which will not take them. Then why should they be called upon to pay?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon to accept the words I have suggested qualifying his amendment.

Mr. NESMITH. I will accept them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is incompetent for the Senator, at this stage, to modify or accept any modification of the amendment, as it has already been acted upon by the Senate and been agreed to in Committee of the Whole. The question now is on concurring in that amendment, and it is open to amendment by the action of the Senate, not by the acceptance of the original mover of the amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then I will move to amend the amendment in the second line after the word "exempt," by striking out the words "by reason of physical disability," and inserting the words "for any physical disability which does not prevent his attending to ordinary business pursuits;" so that it will read:

That any drafted person, who shall be declared to be exempt for any physical disability which does not prevent his attending to ordinary business pursuits, and whose annual gains, profit, or income; &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment moved by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole, as amended on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWARD. I intend to vote for this amendment; but I should like to see the sum which is mentioned in it increased to $1,500. I therefore move to strike out "$1,000," wherever it occurs, and insert "$1,500."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the amendment made in Committee of the Whole as it has been amended in the Senate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Doolittle, Harding, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wade—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—24.

So the amendment as amended was non-concurred in.

Mr. COWAN. I move to strike out the nineteenth section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate are now considering the amendments which have been made in Committee of the Whole. After the Senate shall have acted on all the amendments made in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be open

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, JANUARY 18, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 15.

to amendment on the motion of individual Senators. The next amendment reserved for a separate vote will now be read.

The Secretary read it, which was to insert as a new section the following:

And be it further enacted, That any person not liable to be enrolled or drafted into the military service of the United States may volunteer and then furnish an acceptable substitute, and be relieved from performing duty in person either upon a call for volunteers or when a draft is ordered.

Mr. CLARK. I offered that amendment in Committee of the Whole, and it was adopted. On further consideration, I am satisfied that the amendment may be subject to misconstruction, and perhaps abuse. I did not suppose it would secure many soldiers to the Army, and so small is the object to be attained that it had better be withdrawn, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw it. I do not think it perhaps wise in its present form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proper order of proceeding would be to take the question in the Senate, and if the amendment is non-concurred in, it amounts to the same thing. It would be somewhat irregular to withdraw the amendment after a vote has been taken upon it in Committee.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate having acted on all amendments made in Committee of the Whole, the bill is now open to further amendment.

Mr. COWAN. I move to strike out the nineteenth section of the bill. The first clause of that section provides for regulating the fees to be paid to attorneys by persons seeking exemption. I think there are certain subjects properly within the purview of legislation, and others that are not, and this is one of them. I think it had far better be left to the people to make their own bargains with their attorneys, and they will see that they are well made—better made than we can make them for them.

Again, I look upon this as a simple bounty to pettifoggers. Are these men not to have respectable lawyers, men who require a respectable fee for their services; or are you to confine them to those who will take five dollars, and not expect any more, unless they take it in the face of the law, which they are very likely to do? That is the first objection that I have to this section. I hope that it will be fatal.

There is another clause which provides that—“Any physician or surgeon who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any compensation for furnishing said certificates of disability, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding $300, to be recovered before any court of competent jurisdiction;” &c.

I suppose the intention of this section was hardly to prevent persons enrolled from receiving certificates of disability from physicians; and yet if that was not the purpose, it is very hard to see how a man will get a certificate at all, if the physician is not to be allowed pay for it, and is moreover subject to such an enormous penalty as this for the charge of taking compensation; and that charge, it will be remembered, is very easily made, and very difficult to be disproved. The fact is, if it were once made and supported by a single oath, it would be utterly impossible for any surgeon or physician to disprove it; and that I think is mischievous in the section.

But there is another clause in the same section which I think is not only mischievous, but wrong and absurd; and that is, that attorneys who receive from their clients more than five dollars for their services in each case, and surgeons and physicians who receive any compensation for their services, shall “be fined not exceeding $500, to be recovered before any court of competent jurisdiction in an action of debt, one half for the use of any informer who may sue for the same in the name of the United States”—which, I will remark here in passing, is a bounty to informers, the most obnoxious class of men that exist in any society: the informer and the plaintiff in a qui tam action would have a very nice thing, and no great trouble to make out an action—“one half for the use of any informer who may sue for the same in the name of the United States, and the other half for the use of the United States.” So far, that is all well enough. I suppose a penalty of this kind might be imposed in the way we have imposed it, and it might be recovered in an action of the nature contemplated in this section. But, sir, what follows, it seems to me, is going a very great way beyond that; and that is, that the delinquent “shall also be subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court.” I understand it to be the meaning of the committee who reported this section that the court, after having entered judgment in a qui tam action of debt, may sentence the defendant to a year’s imprisonment.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow me one word of explanation, I will say that we have amended this section about which he is commenting, and changed the language so that it reads thus, as the bill now stands before the Senate:

“Shall for every such offense be fined not exceeding $500, to be recovered upon information or indictment before a court of competent jurisdiction in an action of debt, one half for the use of any informer;” &c.

The words “in an action of debt” are stricken out, and the words “upon information or indictment” are inserted after the word “recovered.” That was done yesterday.

Mr. COWAN. The imprisonment clause is retained, I suppose?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. COWAN. Even if it were amended it is not free from objection; and it cannot be free from objection. The way to multiply the number of criminals in any country is to increase the number of crimes by means of statutes, and to make those things offenses by the law which were not so before. Now, is it necessary at this time to put two such respectable professions as those of law and medicine under the ban of a statute of this kind? It seems to me enormous to impose such penalties as these are for that which heretofore has been perfectly innocent. Nobody supposed heretofore that there was any spice of criminality whatever in it. It is true, I have no doubt, the very class of lawyers who practice under this section have oftentimes imposed upon persons who have been seeking exemption; but how are we to protect those persons in cases of that kind when they cannot protect themselves? Any attempt to do so by means of legislation has always proved futile. These American citizens enrolled and drawn are quite as competent, and far more so, I think, to take care of their own affairs, and make their bargains with their attorneys and physicians, than we are to do it by law. I hope, therefore, this blot will not be put on the bill, because I see nothing but mischief to result from it; and it will be calculated to further the designs of bad men, and to prevent the interference of good ones in the work of procuring exemptions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to amend the bill by striking out the nineteenth section, which will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That the fees of agents and attorneys for making out and causing to be executed any papers in support of a claim for exemption from draft, or for any services that may be rendered to the claimant, shall not in any case exceed five dollars; and physicians or surgeons furnishing certificates of disability to any claimant for exemption from draft shall not be entitled to any fees or compensation therefor. And any agent or attorney who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any greater compensation for his services under this act, and any physician or surgeon who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any compensation for furnishing said certificates of disability, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500, to be recovered before any court of competent jurisdiction upon information or indictment, one half for the use of any informer who may prosecute for the same in the name of the United States, and the other half for the use of the United States, and shall also be subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the Senate will not strike out that section. It proposes to correct a most gross abuse that now exists in nearly all the congressional districts of the country. A class of men have undertaken to engage in this business, and to receive contingent fees amounting to $100, $200, and sometimes $250. It has been a source of corruption and misrepresentation. Men have professed to have great influence with the enrolling board, and have taken enormous fees to get men discharged. This section places the lawyer in these cases upon the same ground as a counsel that engages in a pension case. We have legislated upon that subject. If a soldier now goes to a lawyer, and he aids him in obtaining a pension, the fee is fixed by law. We propose to give the same fee here, and to make the cases equal; and for all proper purposes more labor is required to prepare the papers necessary to obtain a pension than to prepare any papers of this kind.

I hope this section will not be stricken out, and that we shall correct an abuse under which great corruptions have been practiced. Why, sir, there have been paid, and it is well known to be so, in some of the congressional districts, $2,000 and $3,000 as contingent fees. Enormous fees are paid. The sum named in this section is abundant for all proper purposes. The counsel need not go before the enrollment board. All that is necessary for him to do is to make out the proper papers for a person to carry there. I do not know that it is necessary for him to do anything at all, but it can be but very little. I hope, therefore, that a provision intended to correct great abuses that exist in the country will not be stricken out.

Mr. COWAN. If I were to admit the mischief of which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts complains, it would still be no argument in favor of this provision, because it is not calculated to correct it. On the other hand, it is calculated to introduce an additional one. If it be true, as I said before, that attorneys impose upon their clients by charging them too much, there is no way in the world by which that can be remedied. It cannot be remedied certainly by shutting off from the reach of clients the respectable members of the profession who would be likely to be governed by this law, and throwing them into the hands of those who care about no laws of this kind, and who would be perfectly willing for the sake of a fee to run the risk of the prosecution contemplated in this section.

I may say too, and I might appeal to the experience of all lawyers in this body, that laws of this kind never produce the effect that is intended by them. They usually fail; and they fail simply for the reason that the subject itself is not within the proper purview of legislative action. Where people cannot protect themselves, it is no use to attempt it on the part of the law. Only those who are defenseless require that protection; and I should be very glad if the section should be stricken out.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator from Massachusetts would explain what is the effect of this certificate of a surgeon. I think this section applies to surgeons who are not members of the board. What is the effect of such a certificate, and has it any weight whatever before the board?

Mr. WILSON. It has no legal weight; but it has a great deal of influence. The result is that a class of mere quacks have set up this business and have opened offices to write papers for men to present before the board of enrollment; and we want to destroy that business. An honest surgeon living in the neighborhood, knowing a man well, would not hesitate to write a few words in reference to his condition; and that paper is presented to the board and has a certain degree of weight. It is possible that the surgeon of the board may know who this surgeon is and what he is. An honest surgeon desiring to do what was right and proper toward a patient of his would not need any fee for such a service; but a class of men have set up the business of making these papers just as a class of slysters, unworthy members of the legal profession, have set up a similar business for drawing exemption papers. A class of men has thus sprung up of quack doctors and ninth-rate lawyers who have been making fortunes out of the poor men of the country; and we want to cut this up, root and branch.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator will allow me one more question; this section proposes to punish surgeons unconnected with the board who take an extra fee, or any fee, for furnishing these certificates. Is there any law which imposes any penalty upon the surgeon of the board, or upon the board, for using these fictitious certificates, or for improperly and willfully granting improper exemptions?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; both in this and the other act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to strike out the section which has been read.

Mr. COWAN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. If I thought that the retention of this section would answer the purpose the committee had in recommending it, or the Senate would have in adopting it, I should vote against the motion to strike it out. But, so far from its having the designed effect, I think, judging from the experience of the past, it will have the opposite effect. The fee itself, as far as the section allows it for attorneys, five dollars, I have no doubt we may fix by legislation. The legislation of nearly all the States of the Union regulates to a certain extent the fees of counsel. It never has been doubted that it was within the power of legislation to make a regulation of that description; but the regulation in all those cases is one which prohibits to the attorney or counsel who may be employed, the right to recover more than the sum provided for; it does not subject him to a criminal prosecution; but even in those cases where the fee is limited by legislation, contracts are constantly made by which the counsel receives a larger sum than the sum limited by the law, and the courts I believe in all of the States—unless there were positive words prohibiting the making of a contract for a larger sum—have recognized the authority of the citizen to make contracts of that kind; and the practical experience has been, I think, that prohibitory legislation of this nature never does answer the purpose for which it is intended. There are men who will engage to render professional service for five dollars, but it is a professional service, generally speaking, only in name. Men of that description are not competent to render any efficient service; but under a belief, because they profess to be lawyers, that they are competent to the discharge of their profession, many persons are willing to employ them, and they find out, after it is too late, that in order to save a little money for a professional service they have involved themselves in much greater difficulty and in much heavier losses than would have been the result of their paying competent counsel.

Now, as far as the provision in regard to surgeons is concerned, it seems to me that it places the drafted soldier in a very unpleasant situation. I suppose a great many surgeons would very willingly perform this service without being paid at all; but the drafted man may not be within the reach of surgeons of that description; and if the Senator from Massachusetts is right in saying that there exists in some of the States of the Union—I suppose he meant his own State—combinations among surgeons by which they constitute this a matter of business, and for the purpose of the few dollars that they make by it, perpetrate frauds upon the public, it might be very difficult for a poor man who is drafted or any man who is drafted to get a surgical opinion at all; and he would then have to go before the enrolling board and be his own surgeon; whether effectually or not the result would prove.

But, to conclude, Mr. President, the class of counsel, or "attorneys," as this bill calls them, and the class of surgeons against whom the provisions of this section are intended to guard, are not prevented, I think, from perpetrating their frauds by any such provision as this bill contains. If there are men who have no sense of public duty and are governed by no sense of moral propriety, so that they commit the acts to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers, you cannot restrain them by this legislation; they will commit them in spite of your legislation; and the only effect of the legislation, therefore, may be to disgust the honest counsel, and to disgust the honest surgeon, and to prevent them from rendering the service which the citizen may require.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say to the Senator from Maryland that no honest lawyer, I think, will decline to do the little business that is necessary to bring this about for any of his neighbors and friends—

Mr. JOHNSON. I think so too.

Mr. WILSON. He will not decline it for this sum any more than he will decline to do the little business that is necessary to help a wounded soldier to get a pension for what the law allows him to charge for that. We had these same practices in regard to pensions until we corrected them by law. As to surgeons, a man living in the neighborhood of a surgeon, goes to him and says, "You know my condition; you have practiced in my family; I want you to give me a little certificate of my condition, how you regard me, that I may take it to the board." That is all proper; he need not charge that man anything for it; it is a little thing to do, and almost any man would do it freely. But, under the existing law, what do we find? We have a class of lawyers that hang on the skirts of the profession—men without much scruple, who have gone into the business and taken contingent fees, and some of them have made as much as two or three thousand dollars since this act went into effect. They pretend to have great power and influence, and men run after them, and they fleece these poor men to whom they cannot render any assistance on earth unless they have some corrupt influence with the board. We have also a class of medical men, without much conscience, that hang on to the profession. The profession do not respect them much, but they have a little business, and they have set up in the business of giving certificates, and some of them have made fortunes this year by duping the people. I want to cut them off altogether. I have not the least fear of any trouble about it, and I hope the Senate will retain the section.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if it would not be better to prohibit the board of enrollment from receiving any outside certificates. They do not receive them in our State, where, I beg leave to say, the board act with great propriety.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Powell, Saulsbury, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wright—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wilson—24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NESMITH. I now renew the amendment reported by the Military Committee, which was rejected when the Senate was acting as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved on the 3d day of March, 1863, as authorizes the discharge of persons drafted into the service of the United States, under the authority of that act, upon the payment of a sum of money not exceeding $300, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. NESMITH. Mr. President, yesterday, when the amendment to repeal the $300 commutation clause which was reported by the Military Committee was before the Senate, I sought the floor ineffectually in order to state my own views upon the measure; but the rigid and doubtless correct application of an inexorable rule by the Chair prevented my doing so, and I was, as it were, cut off in the flower of my youth.

Inasmuch as the pending motion brings the question again before the Senate, I now take occasion to state my objections to the commutation clause, which, in my opinion, renders the bill worse than useless. I do so, however, with a full consciousness that nothing which I can say will induce the Senate to recede from its vote of yesterday.

When the original bill, sometimes called the conscription bill, was before the Senate at the last session of Congress, I was opposed to the commution provision which released soldiers from the duty of serving in the field by the payment of the mere nominal sum of $300; and I think that the inefficiency of the draft has fully vindicated my judgment in that particular.

I had thought that the able presentations of the case by my friend, the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. LANE,] was sufficient in itself to convince the Senate of the mischievous consequences likely to result from a perpetuation of that clause of the law; and after the rejection of his amendment, like the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN,] I ceased to take any further interest in the bill, regarding it as shorn of its best and most effective features.

This, Mr. President, has been characterized as a "cruel war." It is so in the sense that all wars are cruel; but its cruelty has been enhanced an hundred fold by its procrastination, and want of vigor in its prosecution.

Neither Congress nor the Administration has, in my opinion, had a true appreciation of the magnitude of the undertaking to subdue the rebels in arms against the legitimate authority of the Government. I have constantly entertained the idea that all the energies of the Government should be exerted to bring the conflict to a speedy close, not only for the sake of the Government itself, but for the sake of humanity. For this cause, sir, when our Army failed to be recruited by volunteering, I urged the adoption of the only mode left to consummate that result, namely, drafting; and inasmuch as we had recourse to that means of raising troops, I was anxious that it should be so enforced as to bring the largest possible number of troops into the field.

The result would have been all that we could have desired, had not the bill contained that single exemption clause, permitting the soldier to commute his patriotism with the paltry sum of $300, instead of facing the enemy with the more potent and convincing argument of the bayonet. I should at times have been amused, had the subject been of a less grave nature, when listening to Senators indulging in flights of florid eloquence, and urging upon us the necessity of supporting the Government, and saying that every loyal man owed it his personal service and all he had. I never for a moment supposed that all this was a mere figure of speech, which meant that $300 was a sum sufficient to discharge the entire liability. Money and men are both material elements in the prosecution of a war; yet the former is worthless without the latter, and the raising of either is of itself a question of sufficient magnitude to require separate legislation.

The reduction of patriotism to a financial standard may fill your coffers, but it will as certainly deplete your ranks. I believe that a rigid enforcement of the law, with a repeal of the commutation clause, would raise men sufficient to put an army upon every avenue leading to the heart of rebellion, and crush the rebellion in the next six months. I am as thoroughly convinced that with the means which that clause furnishes to evade the service the next draft will be a greater farce than the preceding one, and that the result will be a prolongation of the war for the next three and perhaps ten years.

As our already redundant currency is expanded, the greater will be the facility for avoiding the duty of the soldier, and I look forward to no distant day when we shall be compelled to repeal the law in order to avoid the exhaustion of men from which to draw soldiers.

It is better to adopt a practical and efficient, though it be a stringent policy, at once, which bears equally upon all; than to resort to temporary expedients which will in the end compel us to ignore the whole system, and drive us to the repeal of the law, and the consequent violation of the quasi pledged faith of the Government which has exempted so many thousand soldiers from duty.

Sir, the petitions which are sent here from the working men of the country, praying for the repeal of the commutation clause of the conscription law, prove conclusively to my mind that the anxiety of the people is not to be relieved from their liability to serve as soldiers, but to see the last vestige of treason crushed out and subdug, and the flag of the Union waving triumphant over every foot of our soil.

I know it is said by some that if the present bill, with the amendments now under consideration, does not answer the purpose we can adopt some other in its place. I am tired, and the country is tired, of that temporizing policy of adopting expedients when we have a sure and certain remedy within our reach; besides, the responsibility imposed upon us is too great to be trifled with. A great and patriotic people demand at our hands that treason be suppressed and the nation restored to its integrity, while we are amusing them with schemes how not to do it.

I said that we had not appreciated the magnitude of our undertaking in putting down this rebellion, and I now think it is time that we begin to look the thing earnestly in the face.

During the first six months of the war we were amused with the predictions that it was to be all over in thirty, then sixty, then ninety days; nearly a thousand days have elapsed, and two hundred thousand of our brethren have fallen, while we are here devising means to keep the residue out of the ranks.

We have raised armies just in proportion as we supposed the rebels had power to resist them, and our successes have been quite as attributable to the mismanagement of our enemy as to our own exhibition of strength, prudence, or forethought.

The war has been a chapter of accidents—I had almost said a comedy of errors. After the first Bull Run the capital was at the mercy of Beauregard, who was only restrained from occupying it by his respect for the orders of a superior.

At Antietam and Gettysburg, victory hesitated long before it perched upon our standard. At the latter battle the absence of a single regiment from the center or the faltering of one there would have rendered the last rebel charge successful, annihilated Meade and his army, placed the capital, Baltimore, and Philadelphia in the hands of the rebels, and transferred their lines to the Delaware.

In September, 1862, Kirby Smith's lines were within four miles of Cincinnati, and in July last Morgan in his raid was within eight miles of the city. There was nothing to prevent the former from taking and holding, or the latter from destroying the Queen of the West, except their ignorance of its true condition.

When I look back upon these probable contingencies it causes me to shudder, and to feel how important it is that no such terrible risks shall be assumed in the future. The only way that I see to avoid them is to dispense with commutation and exemption clauses, and make our Army so powerful as to be invincible.

Twenty thousand additional men would have marched from Malvern Hill to Richmond, and the same number would have destroyed Lee's army at Antietam or Gettysburg. Ten thousand reserves at Chickamauga would have saved our right and enabled Rosecrans to destroy Bragg. Fifty thousand troops might have held Texas long ago, and cut off the principal source of supplies for the rebel army. The men to accomplish all these purposes have stood ready at your bidding, but you have not only had too much modesty to demand their services, with the experience of the past before your eyes you now devise a means by which you never can get them.

I ask Senators to contemplate the prospect of the future. The great heart of the rebel States has not yet been reached by our armies. During the present winter no effort will be spared to augment their forces; the energy of despair will be bent in that direction; and in the spring, with a concentrated and well-disciplined army operating upon short interior lines, they will be able to hurl a combined force against either the army of the Potomac or the Cumberland, one of which, if not crushed, will be rendered inefficient for at least another year.

The present army of the Potomac nor any other will ever reach Richmond by their present route. It will remain an army of observation, or for the defenses of Washington, while your commutation clause will bring money into your Treasury from the men at home who should be approaching Richmond by the other and better route.

I know that it is a favorite theory with some that the armed resistance of the rebels must soon cease on account of the depreciation of their currency. A greater delusion was never indulged in. While it is to a certain extent true that a recognized member of the family of nations is not likely to succeed in war or prosecute it for a long period without money, the history of all revolutions discloses the fact that they have been prosecuted, and in many instances successfully, with an almost entire destitution of funds. Take our own Revolution as a precedent, how many of its battles were fought after its credit was reduced as low, if not lower, than that of the confederates?

I saw the rebel troops fight at Chickamauga with a currency worth five cents on the dollar, and I thought that they stood up to it about as well as our own troops, who had at least eight hundred per cent. the advantage of them on the question of finance. In a country like the rebellious States, where their system of labor produces abundant supplies for an army, they are comparatively independent of the outside world. What cannot be bought is seized by an arbitrary and tyrannical government. With their present resources they have the ability to resist our temporizing policy for the next ten years, and to protract a war indefinitely which should have already terminated.

If the admitted power of the Government can be so exerted as to bring the war to a close within the next six months, even if it should double our present expenses, would it not be good policy to make the effort, instead of procrastinating that result for a dozen years at the present annual cost, with all the threatened dangers of foreign intervention?

We know that the strict enforcement of the draft divested of the commutation clause would promptly raise all the troops we desire, and at the same time give the greatest satisfaction and encouragement to the people, who would thus perceive that the Government was in earnest in its efforts to consummate the desire entertained by the patriotic masses to see the rebellion crushed and the supremacy of the Government restored.

The means to supply such an army we have in the greatest abundance, and the people are only too anxious to contribute them. You may reject their proffered aid and pursue your past policy, and write upon the tombstone of the nation, "DIED OF COMMUTATION."

Mr. HOWE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. When this amendment was before the Senate in Committee of the Whole I voted against its adoption. I was anxious to provide some mode for commuting for the services of those who I thought could not afford to render personal service without an enormous sacrifice to themselves, and in many cases a great sacrifice to the community about them, and who might depend in a great measure upon them; and I thought that could be done without imposing any additional hardship upon those who were compelled to go into the service because they had not the means to commute. Several expedients have been tried, several amendments proposed with the view to lighten the burden upon those who can commute for their services. As I understand the matter, none of them have been adopted. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and adopted by the Senate, already provides one mode, and I think an adequate mode, for exempting this class of persons to whom I have alluded. They can procure substitutes if they are to be found; they can hire them as cheap as the Government can hire them. If a substitute cannot be found for $300, the sum which is proposed here as the measure of commutation, they cannot procure him. If no substitute can be hired for that sum it seems to me that sum ought not to be fixed as the measure of commutation; and since the Senate has decided that this commutation shall not constitute a fund to go to those soldiers who are drafted, and who enter upon the service, I feel compelled to vote now for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon, and to say that no man who is drafted shall be allowed to commute for his services; that if substitutes are to be had he can hire them; but that we shall not fix an arbitrary sum and say the Government shall take that in lieu of personal service, whether they can get a substitute for it or not. If we do that, it is manifest that the law becomes a mere drag-net by which those individuals in the community who are unable to commute for personal service are singled out from the whole body of the community and forced into the ranks to the exclusion of everybody else. Such ought not to be the intent of the law; such ought not to be the effect of the law; and I intend to vote for the adoption of the amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Conness, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nesmith, Ranney, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—15.
NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Essenden, Foot, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a new section to come in immediately after section four:

And be it further enacted, That in addition to the substitute furnished by a drafted person, or, where no substitute is furnished, then in addition to the sum fixed by the Secretary of War for the procurement of a substitute, every such drafted person shall, before his discharge from the draft, be held to contribute a certain proportion, in the nature of a tithe, of his annual gains, profit, or income, whether derived from any kind of property, dividends, salary, or from any profession, trade, or employment whatever, according to the following rates, to wit: on all income over $1,000 and not over $2,000, five per cent.; over $2,000 and not over $5,000, ten per cent.; and on all income over $5,000, twenty per cent. And it shall be the duty of every such person seeking to be discharged to make return, either by himself or his guardian, to the provost marshal of his district of the amount of his income according to the requirement of the act "to provide internal revenue" of July 1, 1862: And it is further provided, That the contribution thus made shall be employed by the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to promote enlistments, or for the benefit of enlisted men.

Mr. President, I offer this amendment now for two reasons: first, because when I offered it before and it was voted upon, I offered it as a substitute for another proposition. The Senate have never voted upon this amendment directly. They voted upon it only as a substitute to the proposition striking out the commutation clause. But the Senate have determined to keep in the commutation clause; the $300 are to be required; and now the question is practically presented whether the Senate will require that $300 of all alike, rich and poor, or whether they will make this burden, so far as possible, in a certain sense equal. I say as it stands it is not equal. I say it is wrong to require the poor man to pay $300 for that exemption and not to require more of the rich man. It is my conviction. I cannot escape from it. I think, sir, you embody in the bill, unless you adopt my amendment, acrying injustice, and I so declare now from my seat here. I make this effort sincerely, with a view to make this important measure more acceptable to the community than it has been, in order to introduce into it an element of justice which it seems to me down to this moment it has not. I ask for the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Is it in order now to move an amendment to the Senator's proposition? If so, I should like to have inserted among the objects for which the money is to be used, "the families of volunteers," leaving it with the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will reduce his proposition to writing if he moves an amendment to the pending amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I appeal to the Senator from Kansas to withhold his proposition now. It may embarrass him. Let us get a vote upon that, and he can afterwards offer his as a separate proposition.

Mr. CONNESS. That will be the best plan.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I will do that.

Mr. JOHNSON. If I thought the bill as it stands without the proposed amendment would work gross injustice, I certainly should vote to adopt the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Massachusetts; but I have been unable heretofore to satisfy myself of that injustice, and I do not think it can be so very apparent, provided it be true, as I rather think it must be true, that the honorable member from Massachusetts voted for the original bill which contained it, and which is now the law.

Mr. SUMNER. I did vote, sir, for the original bill which is now a law, and I am now trying to amend it. I want to make it better, and I hope the Senator from Maryland will help us.

Mr. JOHNSON. I only meant by making the reference to the honorable member to say that it is not so very apparent to me that the proposition as it stands now in the law is very unjust. It cannot be considered so apparently unjust that almost every intellect properly constituted must discover it, for the honorable member from Massachusetts was unable to discover it during the long deliberation that the bill had at a former session.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator remembers well that this whole subject was new when it came up. We were discussing a bill that had never been brought forward before; there were a vast number of propositions; and it came up, too, at the end of the session; we discussed it two or three nights.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Ramsey, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Sausbury, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wright—28.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to offer an amendment as a new section after section four. I will state in a single word that the act as it stands authorizes the enrollment of all able-bodied male citizens of the United States and persons of foreign birth who have declared on oath their intention to become citizens. The section which I offer is this:

And be it further enacted, That all persons having resided in the United States for one year, who shall have exercised the right of suffrage as a citizen by voting at any election in any State of the United States, shall be deemed to be liable to enrollment and draft, and shall be enrolled in the same manner as native-born citizens.

The point is this, Mr. President: the law as it stands enrolls those who have declared their intention to become citizens, but these declarations of intention may be made in any clerk's office throughout the whole United States; and, as a question of fact, to prove whether persons have or have not declared their intentions is exceedingly difficult; but where they have actually resided in the United States for a year and have exercised the right of suffrage as a citizen by voting, that fact is susceptible of proof in every town where they reside. There is no difficulty about it.

Mr. SUMNER. Let me ask the Senator if we did not pass a provision on one of the appropriation bills last year substantially embodying this idea?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I believe not, Mr. President. My recollection of the history of this legislation is that when the first section of the act was under consideration I moved an amendment providing that all persons who shall have on oath declared their intention to become citizens, and who shall have voted as such shall be liable; but the latter words, "and who shall have voted as such," were struck out, and it was adopted without those words.

Mr. COWAN. If the amendment is to prevail, I think the limitation of time should be stricken out. If a foreigner comes to this country and votes within six months, I do not see why that should not operate as an estoppel as well as if he remains a year and then votes. The pith of the whole matter is that he votes without being qualified, and we want to make that an estoppel hereafter when he comes to assert his alienage as a reason why he should be exempt from the draft. I trust the mover of the amendment will modify it as I have suggested, so as to provide that any foreigner who comes here and votes at an election (without specifying any time within which he may have exercised a privilege of this kind) shall be liable to draft, and that that voting shall operate as an estoppel if he claims exemption on the ground of alienage.

Mr. HOWARD. I am opposed to the amendment upon principle. I know not whence the Senator from Wisconsin derives the power of this Government to compel foreigners who have not renounced their allegiance to the country of their birth to perform military service for the United States. It is contrary to the laws of nations and the laws of war. We have no power whatever to compel a subject of Great Britain or France, or any other foreign country, who happens to be within the limits of the United States, to perform military service or to be engaged in our wars on our behalf. I fear that if we adopt such a principle as this in our legislation it may bring us in collision with foreign nations; at all events, I fear that it may engender disputes which would be unnecessary and unpleasant in their consequences, and I am therefore opposed to the proposition entirely. It is quite sufficient, as it seems to me, that we require military service from such foreigners as either have become naturalized citizens of the United States or have voluntarily renounced their allegiance or declared their intention to renounce their allegiance to the country of their birth. As to such persons we perhaps have authority to compel them into our military service; but as to other foreigners who have not made such a renunciation, I am quite clear that we have no power over them whatever to compel them to perform military service. I am opposed entirely to the principle of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I cannot see what difficulty there is in compelling a person who has the protection of our Government, and who voluntarily has taken part in the administration of the Government, to perform military service. The law as it now stands subjects to military service persons who have not taken the oath of allegiance to the country; if they have declared their intention to become citizens, they are subject to military duty under the law as it now is; and shall it be said that a foreigner can come here to this country, abstain from taking the oath of allegiance to the country, maintain his position as an alien, hold office in this country, vote at our elections, choose our rulers for us, and not be subject to military duty? It is a voluntary act on his part. Let him refrain from the exercise of the right of suffrage if he is not willing to defend the country.

I cannot see any force in the objection of my friend from Michigan, not the least, unless we deny the right of a person to expatriate himself. Why, sir, has not Congress power to naturalize foreigners? That power is given by the Constitution, and I hold that it would be competent to declare by act of Congress that every person who took upon himself the right of suffrage should thereby become a citizen of the United States. We can regulate this entire matter by law. Will the Senator from Michigan tell me why it is not competent for us to declare in this very act that if any person of foreign birth assumes to take part in the administration of the Government by voting or holding office under it, he shall thereby become a citizen of the United States? Have we not the power to do it? I think so; and surely we have power to compel him to aid in the defense of the Government which he seeks to take part in administering.

But I quite agree with what fell from the Senator from Pennsylvania that there should be no limit as to time. We should not require a foreigner to reside here a year in order to subject him to military service if he votes; and I think we should not only subject the man who votes to military service but also one who holds office. I submitted to the previous bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs on this subject an amendment to carry out both these objects, which is in print and on the tables of Senators. It was offered as an amendment to Senate bill No. 18, and I submit to the Senator from Wisconsin whether it does not cover the whole ground a little more fully than his amendment. I send it to the table and ask that it be read, and then I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will accept it in lieu of his amendment, as being a little more full.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That no person of foreign birth shall, on account of alienage, be exempted from enrollment or draft under the provisions of this act, or the act to which it is an amendment, who has at any time assumed the rights of a citizen by voting at any election held under authority of the laws of any State or Territory or of the United States, or who has held any office under such laws or any of them; but the fact that any such person of foreign birth has voted or held, or shall vote or hold, office as aforesaid, shall be taken as conclusive evidence that he is not entitled to exemption from military service on account of alienage.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I believe that is in better form than the amendment which I offered, and I therefore accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is competent for the mover of the amendment to accept this in lieu of his original proposition; and this is now the amendment before the Senate as the amendment moved by the Senator from Wisconsin.

sin. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois puts the question whether it is not competent for Congress to naturalize and declare to be citizens of the United States such foreigners as may see fit to participate in our elections, holding (as I infer from his language that he does hold) that Congress have that power, and that if they should see fit to exercise it, a foreigner would become ipso facto naturalized and a citizen of the United States by going to the polls in the State where he should happen to be and there voting. Now, sir, I deny that principle entirely, because it rests upon the false assumption that it is competent for the State Legislatures to declare who shall be or who shall not be naturalized citizens of the United States, and thus State laws come to exclude entirely the power of Congress over the subject. Under the Constitution, Congress alone have power to naturalize foreigners; and they must do it, as they have done it heretofore, not by passing special statutes applying to particular localities or to particular persons, but they must exercise the power in the form of a uniform system of naturalization. It is for Congress, and Congress alone, to exercise this power. The power is exclusive in Congress, and no part of it pertains to the States. It is not a concurrent power which may be used sometimes by a State and sometimes by the national Legislature; but it is a power exclusively lodged in Congress, to be exercised by them and not by the States.

What right, then, has a State, in reference to the creation of naturalized citizens of the United States, to set up for itself a power to constitute citizens of the United States—not citizens of Illinois or of Michigan; they may do that, perhaps, but a State cannot constitute a naturalized citizen of the United States. There is the point to which I desire to call the attention of the learned Senator from Illinois. A State may make voters; his own State, I suppose, like my State, does allow the privilege of voting to certain classes of foreigners who have not been naturalized under the laws of the United States; but who has ever pretended that the persons thus naturalized, so to speak, by the local law are at the same time citizens of the State and citizens of the United States? I deny that the States have any power to make citizens of the United States out of foreigners. It is a power pertaining to us exclusively; and hence my conclusion is this: that whatever may be the legislation of a State, however a State may see fit to extend the privilege of voting to foreigners, and however willing they may be to exercise that privilege, the exercise of the privilege by the foreigner under the State does not constitute him a citizen of the United States, and we have power only over citizens of the United States when we proceed to call them into the military service of the United States. That is the point.

But the Senator cannot fail to recognize the principle of national law, and the law of war, that a nation only has power to call upon its own citizens or subjects to perform military service, except in peculiar cases, in cases of breach of the peace or local disturbance, where it is as necessary for the protection of the foreigner that order should be restored as for the citizen. But it is an unheard-of principle, I insist and assert, in the laws of nations that one nation may call on the subjects of another nation who happen to be within its borders, perhaps as mere sojourners for the moment, to perform military duty, and thus to force them into the field even against their own countrymen; for if we can compel a foreigner to participate in our battles at all upon principles of law, we may compel him to take arms against his own countrymen in a war between our own country and his country.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan if a person who has given notice of his intention to become a citizen is a citizen of the United States? He says none others can be compelled to do military duty.

Mr. HOWARD. I answer that I do not regard a foreigner who has simply declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States as a citizen of the United States. The question itself implies a contradiction in terms.

Mr. DIXON. Then I would ask the Senator how it is that the present law requires such persons to do military duty under the conscription act?

Mr. HOWARD. I will answer that question. The Congress of the United States and the Executive have seen fit so to enact. They have passed just such a law as that. Whether it is a constitutional act has never been tested. I have some doubts about it myself I confess, though I do not see any necessity for discussing that question at this period.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I really cannot understand the Senator from Michigan. The proposition pending does not propose to naturalize any one by virtue of a State law. We propose by an act of Congress, an act of uniform operation, to make certain persons subject to military duty; and by way of illustration, I said it was competent for Congress to make them citizens. Congress has repeatedly done it. Several of the naturalization laws have declared persons in the country at a certain period, and who took part in the defense of the country, to be citizens of the United States. This is not a proposition to allow the States to make citizens of the United States, but it is a proposition of Congress declaring that persons who take part in the Administration of the Government of the country shall be liable to military duty.

Mr. HOWARD. I think that perhaps the Senator from Illinois did not understand me. He perhaps was not attending to my remarks. What I said, or intended to say, was that the power of every nation in carrying on war is restrained to its own citizens in reference to the rendition of military service. They can call upon their own citizens, and their own citizens only, to render that service. That is the ground on which I start, as a principle of national law.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not agree with the Senator from Michigan as to the national law. I think a nation may call upon all persons within its jurisdiction to rally to its defense, and it is not necessary that they should be citizens of the country; but that is not the point: the question here is whether, when foreigners have voluntarily placed themselves under the protection of the Government and taken part in its administration, we may not compel them to perform military service.

I may state that this proposition is in harmony with the recommendation of the President, which was to subject to military duty all persons who voted at elections. It has been stated to me by the Senator from Pennsylvania that possibly this amendment ought to be modified or changed so as only to make liable those persons who vote at municipal elections under State or territorial authority; that as it is worded—I have not it before me at this moment—it might include persons who voted at corporate elections. If so, it ought to be changed.

Mr. CLARK. That cannot be the meaning of the word "voting."

Mr. TRUMBULL. No change is necessary, if that is not the meaning.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to amend the section adopted as in Committee of the Whole on my motion, by adding the words stricken out in committee. I desire to make one more effort to increase the amount of the commutation. I think that without this amendment this bill amounts to nothing, or to very little. I therefore submit the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves at the end of line twenty-one in the section referred to by him, after the word "calls," to insert the words, "and the maximum of commutation under this act shall hereafter be $500, instead of $300."

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not at this late hour intend to detain the Senate, nor would I move this amendment but that I feel the importance of it. The bill as it now stands is not very material. I have read over this bill, and I believe it discharges from enrollment more persons than it places on the list; that is, the second section, which gives States credit for the number of persons who are now in the naval service, I believe, will give a credit for a number—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not those now in service, but those hereafter enlisted in the naval service are to be credited.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; those now in service.

Mr. WILSON. That have been enrolled.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; those that have been enrolled the States get credit for. I think the number of persons included in the second section will be nearly as great as those who were in the old law subject to exemption on account of the care of parents and the like. I think the number will not materially differ, so that I think there is no substantial, no striking, marked difference between the two that makes this bill so preferable to the old law. There are some amendments wisely adopted; I have no objection to them, but there is no marked difference between the old enrollment law which Senators have complained over and over again failed, which the Department considered as having failed, and the proposed law. I think we ought to increase the commutation if we do not avoid it entirely. I therefore submit this amendment. It has already been sufficiently discussed—

Several SENATORS. Make it $400.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think $500 is too much, but it is within the power of the Senate to make it $400 if they choose.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, I have favored the conscription law; I have voted for it and have spoken in favor of it; but I shall feel constrained to vote against the bill now pending in its present shape. It is no conscription law. It is a revenue measure, not a conscription law, and it will not bring troops into the field, and I shall at the proper time move an amendment to the title of the bill. With proper regard to the courtesies of legislation, I think that amendment should be adopted, and then the title of the bill would read, "A bill to raise a tax of $300 by lottery from certain able-bodied men who are unwilling to enter the military service of the United States." That is precisely what the bill is—no more, no less.

I shall not repeat my arguments about the $300 commutation clause; it is unnecessary to do so. I will state, however, that if you pass this bill in this shape you will get no men under it. When the time comes to move in the spring campaign you must have more troops in the field than you now have. I will show you the great injustice of the bill as it now stands as affecting the people of my own State. The State of Indiana has filled up by volunteering her full quota. The State of Vermont, and, perhaps, the State of Rhode Island, have done the same thing. A call has been made for three hundred thousand troops. Indiana has placed her volunteers in the field. At the same time we say that the State of Pennsylvania—I only use the name of that State for illustration—or any other State which does not fill her quota by volunteering may buy an exemption for $300. In other words, you require the personal service, the blood, it may be the life of the brave volunteers of my State, and you tell the people of other States, whose patriotism has not been so ardent as to fill their quota, that they discharge their full duty by paying $300.

Suppose, if you please, that in the next spring campaign the Indiana volunteers shall march to the frontiers of Georgia; a great battle is fought; they are overpowered by superior numbers, and they fall by thousands; what answer is it when these people ask why your armies were not filled to tell them that certain patriotic sections of the country have bought exemption for $300? Sir, this is simply a bill to prevent the operation of a draft. I am in favor of a conscription law, and would vote for it; but I will not vote for this most expensive, most cumbersome, and most demoralizing system of taxation that has ever been devised upon earth, and that is to assess arbitrarily by lottery $300 upon the man who is so unfortunate as to be drafted. I am opposed to all commutation. I shall not vote to increase it to $500. I would rather vote to make it five dollars or one dollar, and bring it within the reach of all, rich and poor, to buy their exemption if they choose. We need soldiers, and this is a military bill reported by the Military Committee. After it comes into the Senate an amendment is moved to strike out the report of that committee; and it is favored by the chairman of the committee. I am free to admit that he opposed this repeal all the while in the committee.

But if you are to have a conscription law, make it effective; do not leave it a mockery. I will vote for no such vicious and demoralizing system of taxation as this. I shall vote against the whole measure, with the perfect confidence that in less than three months this Senate will pass a conscription bill which shall be effective for the purposes intended by it, and which shall not deceive the people by proposing to raise men on the one side and offering to allow the purchase of exemption by the payment of $300 on the other. If you pass a conscription bill which will fill the ranks of your armies and thus satisfy the confederate States in rebellion and satisfy the world that we are going to use the whole physical power of the Government to crush out this rebellion, you will do more toward that object than by any other means; but if you pass this bill I shall regard it as more disastrous to the country than a reverse to our armies in the field. You simply say that instead of calling upon the whole power of the country to defend the country you will suffer the men whose patriotism is at fault, who lag behind, who do not fill their quota by volunteering, to be fully exempted on the payment of $300. I apprehend nothing but the most disastrous consequences to result from such legislation as this.

Nor is the war over. Calculate the chances of reverses. It may last for years. I care not how many years it may last. I will fight it out to the bitter end; and I ask this Senate to rise to the height of this great argument, to remember what the country expects and what God demands. It is not a paltry sum of $300, but, if needs be, it is the life of every able-bodied citizen in the Republic.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as amended by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio to take the amendment as it was amended yesterday. His first proposition was to make the commutation $500. That was reduced, on motion of the Senator from New York, [Mr. HARRIS,] to $400; and it stood in that position when the entire clause was erased from the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply wish to get at the sense of the Senate, feeling myself impressed with the justice of my amendment. I offer now what I conceive to be the right sum; but if the Senate think $400 better, they can vote down my proposition, and the Senator can offer another, making the sum $400. I prefer to stand by what I consider to be the correct sum. If the Senate disagree with me, as a matter of course the proposition to fix it at $400 can be made just as it was before.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The only objection I have to it, and which weighs on my mind, is the one which I have stated when the Senator offered this proposition in Committee of the Whole. It was one derived from our experience on this subject. We made $300 the maximum in the former bill. The result was that the maximum was offered, and to veterans with the addition of the $100 which was before given as bounty by the War Department. Then when it became advisable to offer premiums for volunteering, they arrived at those premiums in the same way. Now, if we should raise this sum to $500, and it should be again decided by the War Department or the Executive that it was better to proceed by way of offering premiums, my idea is that the amount we fix by way of commutation will form the precise rule by which they will arrive at the sum to be offered as premium, as it did before.

My habit of thought here in the Senate probably arises from the exclusiveness to which my attention has been devoted to the subject of money; and perhaps that may have narrowed my views in a very considerable degree. I have been, however, in the habit of thinking that that which lay at the bottom of the whole struggle was the ability to meet the expenditures of the war, and so to conduct our affairs that at no time should we be left in a position in which we had not the means to carry on the war. I saw, or I believed I saw, that if that time should come, we should find the severest blow that could possibly be struck by us or anybody else had been struck at the success (if anything in the world could prevent it) of the war which we are carrying on at the present time.

That forms my only objection to this proposition. I admit there is something in the argument which my friend from Ohio has adduced, that owing to the expansion of the currency the $500 would not probably be larger than the $300 was at the time we passed the bill. I do not think there is that difference between that period of time and the present; but still, yielding something to that argument, I should be willing to raise the commutation somewhat, although I dread the consequences of keeping on in the line which seems to have been adopted with regard to this matter.

Now, sir, one word to my honorable friend from Indiana. I do not think that the consequences which he has portrayed are exactly necessary or unavoidable. If I understand this draft at all (and perhaps I do not, for I have not been able to give the same degree of attention to military matters that I have to some others) I do not see that the payment of a certain sum of money by way of commutation exempts a State from furnishing its quota. If, for instance, a call is made and a certain number of men is required from a particular State, a draft is made and a certain number of men are drawn. A portion of them pay their commutation, thus falling short of the number called for. Is it not manifest that all they have to do is to order another draft under that call and keep on drafting until they get the number required from that State? I apprehend that is the ordinary course to be pursued, and that is the course which I supposed would have been pursued under the law that we passed last year. The Executive Department, for what seemed to it good reasons, and which reasons have been approved by Congress in the laws that have been passed at this session with regard to it, adopted a different system; but still there was a course which the Executive might have followed, to wit: if the first draft failed, order another, and another, and another, until the required number of men were drawn, unless the quota was filled in some other way. That was not done, and therefore the consequence followed which has been pointed out by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, under that bill, as under this one, a man could buy himself off by the payment of $300; and if all those who were drafted were to buy themselves off, there would be no men furnished.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Exactly; but all do not buy themselves off, and when you have exhausted the roll you put all those who have paid in the wheel and draw them over again. That is what you will do under this bill as it stands. Unquestionably that is the effect of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of my friend from Maine, I will say it will operate more strongly against those States that pay, because they must still furnish their quota. After paying the commutation, they must go on and fill up their quota.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Unquestionably they have got to furnish their number of men. If you require a thousand men and they are drawn, and five hundred pay commutation, and you get but five hundred, you have got your commutation for five hundred, and then you draw again to get five hundred, and you keep on drawing until you get the number required. If all of them pay, you put all the names in and draw again until you get the required number. That is what the law is, and that is what you do.

Mr. GRIMES. How long do you do that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Just exactly until you get the men required, be it longer or shorter. The result is, that the States which pay not only pay but furnish the men too if the thing is followed; and therefore the consequence by no means follows that my friend from Indiana has pointed out if the Government choose to enforce the law which we put into their hands. Besides, this commutation money does get men. It is used for other purposes. It may be used to hire colored men or other men in other sections of the country; and yet it does not excuse the State from furnishing the number called for, unless they raise it by volunteering or otherwise. It only leaves that State to bear a double burden. I will take for example its effect in my own State. We have got to raise our quota and fill it up. Vermont has filled hers. A large number in my State paid the commutation; but still the men have to be furnished. How do we do? A great many persons paid commutation, and then the towns and cities went to work and offered large bounties to men to come forward and enlist. In addition to getting the bounties offered by the United States, recruits received bounties from the towns. Men got $800 and $1,000 for enlisting. Thus it will be seen that the payment of commutation throws a very heavy burden on the State which pays; but it is a burden which the State chooses to take upon itself. It does not add one feather to the weight that is placed on the State that is so well represented by my honorable friend from Indiana—not a feather. It only shows that if the men of that State volunteer and do not pay they do not bear so heavy a burden as we do, for we furnish the men and pay besides.

Mr. President, so much feeling should not exist on this subject. I always regret to differ from the report of a committee which has investigated a subject, but because a committee make a recommendation to the Senate and the Senate chooses to differ, chooses not to be convinced, and follows the views of the minority, I do not see that it gives occasion for so much feeling, as if the committee or the members of the committee who constitute the majority had been injured because on full discussion a majority of the Senate come to a different conclusion. Why, sir, it is my fate very frequently to make reports from my committee which the Senate overrule decidedly and promptly. I do not feel hurt about it in any shape or form. I do the best I can to enforce my own views, and if the majority is against me I do not allow myself to feel as if I had been personally injured because other people think themselves wiser than I am, and I have come very frequently to the conclusion myself that they are wiser than I am, and am very glad they did so decide. I do not think, therefore, because my honorable friend from Indiana and certain other gentlemen on that committee have considered this subject and have very strong and fixed opinions upon it that it necessarily follows if the majority of the Senate, two to one, decide otherwise, that they are right and the majority are wrong, and that the country is necessarily to sink because their views are not carried out.

Now, sir, there is room for a very great difference of opinion on this subject. I confess I have thought from the beginning that this idea of commutation was a wise one. It excuses no State from its quota, but it relieves a great many persons who are not able to serve in person. It does not diminish one whit the force of the argument that every one owes his personal service, and when the time comes must yield his personal service. If the country can afford to dispense with it for a time on certain conditions, it does not vary the principle. The only question is whether the time has come when it cannot dispense with the personal service of any and every man. When it does come, then it must be met. The argument I adduced in reference to that matter was founded on that idea; but at the same time it was founded, as Senators will recollect, on the idea that we were to take a different course from that which has been taken heretofore; and that was, to insist on the draft and carry it through.

Sir, if you had taken that system, or if you will take that system, and will insist upon it, and carry it through from beginning to end, time after time, and abolish your system of offering enormous bounties, and put it upon the question of compulsion alone, I will vote to strike out the commutation; but Congress will not do that, and the Government, including the whole of its departments, will not do it. Therefore, so far as that is concerned, the two points must be taken together in the shape in which I introduced them, if I am to be considered as bound by them.

If this principle of commutation is wrong, I hope my view will be overruled. I want to reach the right; but at the same time I do not feel compelled, especially by strong denunciations, to yield my deliberate judgment with reference to it; nor do I feel compelled, because an individual Senator may think we are doing great injustice in a particular case to believe that I am willfully doing that kind of injustice or any injustice in relation to the matter.

If the sum is too small I am perfectly willing to enlarge it; but avoid, if you can, the risk (because I believe it is a risk) of making such tremendous drafts upon what, after all, lies at the bottom of the whole, and which we have got to consider, and do not carry it to such a point as in a measure to defeat our own object by striking out that which is most essential.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it is very manifest that we cannot finish this bill to-night, as debate is springing up all over the Senate upon it. I should be quite willing to sit here if I thought we could finish it within any reasonable time; but I do not think we can; and, as it is somewhat important that we should go into executive session for a few minutes, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILSON. I hope we shall not go into executive session.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Illinois will withdraw his motion for the present. I think we can dispose of this bill in a very few moments. I will move to amend the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, as I did yesterday, by striking out "five" and inserting "four." I hope the Senate will take a vote on that question at once, and then I think we can dispose of this bill in a few minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly; I will withdraw it. I do not wish to press the motion if we can get through with the bill to-night; but at the same time we are just punishing ourselves and accomplishing nothing. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Ohio by striking out "five" and inserting "four," so that the maximum of commutation shall be $400 instead of $500 as proposed in that amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent to move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. COLLAMER. Let us first ascertain whether we can finish this bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, striking out "five" and inserting "four."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 22, noes 18.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment as amended, by which the maximum of commutation is fixed at $400 instead of $300.

The question being taken, there were, on a division—ayes 23, noes 17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS, Mr. CONNESS, and Mr. POWELL called for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will entertain the call, although it is out of the power of Senators to call for the yeas and nays after a division has been had, and the result has been announced. The Chair is unwilling to conclude the action of the Senate by what may, perhaps, be regarded as a premature enunciation on the part of the Chair. The yeas and nays are demanded on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I voted for the amendment to the amendment last voted upon under a misapprehension, and I therefore move its reconsideration.

Mr. HOWE. There is a question pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. DAVIS. I voted for the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator voted to strike out "five," and to insert "four."

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir, by misapprehension; and I move a reconsideration of that vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amended the proposition of the Senator from Ohio by striking out "five" and inserting "four."

Mr. FOSTER. I ask whether that is in order during the pendency of this other question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair regards it in order as a privileged question, as the Senate is not in the act of dividing.

Mr. GRIMES. I want to understand what I am going to vote for. As I understand the question, if I am in favor of substituting $500 in the place of $300, as the law now stands, I vote "aye" with the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves to reconsider the vote by which "five" was stricken out and "four" was inserted. If that motion to reconsider be carried, the first question will then recur on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment inserting four instead of five, and if that is negatived, the question will stand on the original proposition fixing $500.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Kentucky says he voted under a misapprehension. Under those circumstances it is always customary, I believe, to allow the vote to be taken over again. I hope that will be done, and that we shall then have a vote by yeas and nays on both propositions.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment moved by the Senator from New York to the amendment moved by the Senator from Ohio, to strike out "five" and insert "four."

Mr. GRIMES. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Powell, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Morgan, Nesmith, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wade, and Wilkinson—16.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio as amended upon the motion of the Senator from New York, and upon this question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The question is on substituting $400 as the maximum price of commutation in the place of $300 as it now stands.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlile, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Saulsbury, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wright—19.

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I have an amendment which I wish to offer. It has been submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and there is no objection to it:

And be it further enacted, That the fifteenth section of the act to which this is amendatory be so amended that it will read as follows: "That any surgeon charged with the duty of such inspection who shall receive from any person whomsoever any money or other valuable thing, or agree, directly or indirectly, to receive the same, to his own or another's use, for making an imperfect inspection or a false or incorrect report, or who shall wilfully neglect to make a faithful inspection and true report, and each member of the board of enrollment who shall wilfully agree to the discharge from service of any drafted person who is not legally and properly entitled to such discharge, shall be tried by a court-martial, and on conviction thereof be punished by a fine not less than $300 and not more than $10,000, and shall be imprisoned at the discretion of the court, and be cashiered or dismissed the service."

Mr. JOHNSON. Does that apply to surgeons in the Army alone?

Mr. HOWE. Surgeons of the board of enrollment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is all right.

Mr. JOHNSON. It may be all right, but the suggestion I was about to make was whether it be advisable to try by court-martial—

Mr. HOWE. The law as it now stands provides for that mode of trial.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. If I understood the argument of the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. Fessenden,] either he or myself very much misapprehends this whole bill. I understood that his argument proceeded on the ground that although the $300 exemption was paid, the States were still bound to furnish their quotas respectively without regard to that. If I am correctly informed, under the operation of the old conscription law (and I suppose it will be the same under this bill) every single exemption on payment of $300 was counted as part of the quota of the State in which the man lived who paid the money. I so understand, and for the correctness of the position I appeal to those more familiar with the subject than I am. Instead of taking on a double burden, the quota of those States whose citizens do not volunteer but buy their exemptions from the draft by the payment of $300 is considered filled by paying the $300 precisely as much as by putting a man in the field.

Mr. COWAN. I do not know how that fact was; but I think before the drawing in Pennsylvania, a certain number of men was required as her quota, fifty per cent. was added to that number, and then the drawing took place. This drawing was made out of the enrollment before it was purged of any exemptions whatever. They drew on till they drew the number called for, and fifty per cent. additional, and then stopped.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Notwithstanding those who had paid?

Mr. COWAN. They drew a certain number of men. If some paid, very well; if not, otherwise. If nobody paid and nobody was exempt for physical disability or for any other reason authorized by the law, then they would have had not only the number called for, but fifty per cent. more. They drew the number called for, and fifty per cent. additional, and then stopped.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Was not every man who paid $300 counted in making up the quota of that State as one furnished to the Army? That is the question.

Mr. COWAN. That question did not arise. They drew the number of men called for, and they drew fifty per cent. more, but it was not questioned whether the quota was made up in men or whether it was made up in men and money, so far as I have understood.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know how the fact may be as to what construction was put upon this portion of the law at the War Department; I have not heard. I was only speaking of my own construction. I regard this privilege of paying $300 and being exempted thereby merely as a personal privilege. The Government calls for so many men from a State. It provides that any one man who pays a certain amount may commute by paying that amount, and that goes into the Treasury, or goes into the hands of the War Department to procure a substitute; but I remember nothing in the law which says in any way that that shall excuse the State from furnishing the number of men called for. By way of illustration, let me suppose (though it is an absurd supposition as a matter of fact) that everybody all over the United States paid the commutation, we should be without men, and the Government would be left to get men by volunteering, and the draft would be at an end. Nobody can put that construction upon it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. They have done it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator I suppose understands so, but I doubt it very much, and if they have put that construction upon it, I doubt very much whether it is the correct construction. To be sure, I have not scrutinized the law carefully so as to give an opinion upon this point as a lawyer, but I never had that idea for a single moment; and hence I contended that the business of the Government was, when the first draft failed to give the number of men required, to go on drafting until they got it. There was perfect authority for that. The law can be turned to by any gentleman, and let him see if he can find anything in it which says that a man paying the $300 shall be credited to the State toward the number of men called for from the State. There is nothing of that sort in the law.

Mr. JOHNSON. The opinion of the Department is otherwise, as I understand.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to know what is the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe.]

Mr. COLLAMER. This discussion seems to have nothing to do with that.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to say a single word on the amendment before the Senate. I am in favor of its principle decidedly, and if the Senator from Wisconsin will make the civil courts the tribunal to try the offenses that it recognizes, I shall vote for it with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. ANTHONY. They are military officers.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not so understand.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly they are.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I have nothing further to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWE called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that this amendment moved by the Senator from Wisconsin simply imposes the same punishment upon the enrolling officer that it imposes upon the surgeon.

Mr. HOWE. It increases the penalty.

Mr. WILSON. And it increases the penalty slightly. At the time we passed the original act, the enrolling officer was regarded as a temporary person employed for a short time; but as he is now necessarily employed throughout the year, and will be while the war lasts, there is no reason why he should not be put under the same restrictions that the surgeon is. He is part of the board. I think the measure right, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. HOWARD. I concur entirely with the Senator from Massachusetts in reference to the necessity of amending the fifteenth section of the conscription law. The board consists of three persons; one of these persons is a surgeon, but while acting upon the board he has no more authority than any other member of the board; and this board, acting jointly, is the tribunal to which are referred all questions relating to causes of exemption. Now, the law as it stands, the law of 1863, inflicts a very severe punishment upon the surgeon for misconduct in the examination of recruits, but it inflicts no punishment at all upon other members of the board who are guilty, perhaps, of conduct equally corrupt, equally reprehensible. It seems to be a casus omissus in the old statute, which, it appears to me, ought to be supplied. That is the sole purpose, to put all the members of the board on the same level as to guilt and as to punishment.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not consider that the other members of the enrolling board than the surgeon are in the military service of the United States. I regard them as civilians performing an isolated military duty; and I do not believe that they can be properly made subject to punishment by a military tribunal.

Mr. HOWARD. I dissent entirely from the view taken of this subject by the Senator from Kentucky. I regard the entire board as being in the military service of the United States under the Constitution, and subject to martial law, subject to be tried and punished by court-martial; but it is too late in the day to argue that question; I simply rose to state my dissent from the view which the Senator from Kentucky takes of it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 33, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Harding, Hendricks, Powell, Saulsbury, and Wright—7.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, whether the Senator from Maine is correct or not in the proper construction of the act of last session in the particular to which he has alluded, I am not prepared to say. I have not looked at the law recently, nor do I remember that I have looked at it at all with a view to the particular question to which he has referred; but my belief is that the Department have put upon it the interpretation mentioned by the Senator from Indiana, and they have done it upon the theory that the payment of $300 by the drafted person is equivalent to furnishing a man. If Maryland, for example, has eight thousand as her quota, and only four thousand of them actually go into the field, either by way of substitute or in person, and the other four thousand pay each his $300, Maryland's quota is considered as full, because, according to the interpretation put upon the law by the War Department or by the President, the money is considered as equivalent to a man.

I can readily see that very great mischief may be the result of that construction; but I am not prepared to say that the construction is not right. If it be right, it is a mischief that I think consequent upon that construction, that ought to be corrected. It would seem to be but just, if the $300, or the $400 as we have made it now, procures a man, that the State should have the benefit of that man, of that equivalent; but if the $400 will not procure a man, and it may not, it would seem but right, and necessary indeed, that the man should be supplied in some other way; and the only mode in which the man can be supplied, if the $400 does not get him, is by going again to Maryland—I instance Maryland for the purpose of illustration merely—and insisting upon another draft. I have no doubt that the Senator from Maine is correct in saying that the whole object of the conscription may be defeated by such an interpretation as I believe has been given to the law by the Department; but if the Senate should think that that interpretation ought to be guarded against by making the law plain upon the subject, or by making a law for the first time on the subject, in preparing such an amendment it will be found, I think, when we come to make the attempt, that it will not be so easy to do it without doing some other wrong; and it is so late now in the day that individually I would prefer, and I therefore suggest, that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. If the Senator will withdraw that motion for a moment, I will offer an amendment on this subject, so that it may be printed, and considered when we meet again. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN:]

The money paid for commutation within any State shall be expended to procure substitutes for persons drafted within such State, and the payment of commutation money by any drafted person shall not operate to release the State in which he was drafted from filling its quota, but the draft shall proceed in such State until its quota is filled.

Mr. JOHNSON. That does not cover it. The intention was, I understood, to present the proposition with a view to have it printed.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. I now move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us adjourn to Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON. I said until to-morrow.

Mr. RAMSEY. Would it be in order now to move to adjourn over to Monday before we adjourn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would not.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

Pending the motion to adjourn, the following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred, namely:

A bill (No. 143) to amend the law prescribing the articles to be admitted into the mails of the United States—to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A bill (No. 144) to indemnify the owners of the British schooner Glen—to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A bill (No. 145) for the relief of the heirs of Noah Wiswall—to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON:] that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 24, noes 17; and the Senate adjourned.

The motion was agreed to.

SMALL-POX IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I desire to state to the House that the Committee for the District of Columbia, under the instruction of the House, have had the matter of the small-pox in this District under consideration, and have received several communications from different persons, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

January 14, 1864.

Sir: The undersigned, members of the committee to whom a reference was made to examine into the corporate powers of the Mayor and City Council of the city of Washington, respectfully report, that among the powers conferred by the act of 1830, incorporating the city of Washington, and still in force, are the following, contained in section seven:

"To establish a board of health, with competent authority to enforce its regulations, and to establish such other regulations as may be necessary to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases and for the preservation of the health of the city."

And the following in section eight:

"To establish and erect hospitals or pest-houses," &c. Considering these provisions and the annexed report of the Surgeon General, it appears to the undersigned that no further legislation by Congress is necessary in the premises. All which is respectfully submitted.

THOMAS T. DAVIS,

JOHN B. STEELE.

Hon. OWEN LOVEJOY,

Chairman Committee District of Columbia.

SURGEON GENERAL'S OFFICE,

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., January 13, 1864.

Sir: I have the honor to report, for the information of the Committee of the House for the District of Columbia, that, having received authority from the honorable Secretary of War to give hospital accommodation to all such cases of small-pox occurring in the District as could not be provided for by the civil authorities, measures were adopted two months since to enlarge the Kalorama hospital, and upon application by the mayor or superintendent of police, small-pox patients are at once removed to it for treatment. A small-pox hospital has also been established at Alexandria, under similar regulations. Increased facilities for vaccination, or revaccination, have been furnished for all employees of the Government, and it has been recommended to the superintendent of police that an office for gratuitous vaccination of all persons be at once opened in a central portion of the city.

The vaccination of all children attending the public schools, and of all the police and other employees of the city, could be made compulsory, and is respectfully recommended as a sanitary measure.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH K. BARNES,

Acting Surgeon General.

Hon. OWEN LOVEJOY,

Chairman House Committee of District.

MAYOR'S OFFICE, CITY HALL,

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 11, 1864.

Sir: In compliance with your request to inform the committee of which you are chairman what measures had been adopted to prevent the spread of eruptive contagious diseases, and what provision made for the care and treatment of those afflicted therewith, I have the honor to state that the small-pox, which now apparently creates some apprehension in the public mind and alarm in the Houses of Congress was, previously to 1861 and the breaking out of this rebellion, an event of so rare an occurrence that it excited little or no attention in the community.

The bringing into the city of thousands, and the crowd that usually follows such bodies, if it did not introduce, certainly occasioned the spread of the contagion, and induced me to call the attention of the City Councils to the fact of its prevalence in our midst in the following communication:

MAYOR'S OFFICE, CITY HALL,

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 1, 1861.

To the Board of Aldermen and Board of Common Council.

GENTLEMEN: It may not be improper to suggest to your Boards the necessity of making some provision for the speedy removal of infected persons, the destruction of furniture and wearing apparel, where necessary for the health of the community. The rapid spread of eruptive contagious diseases renders some action on your part imperatively necessary, and must be my apology for calling your attention to this subject.

Very respectfully,

RICHARD WALLACH, Mayor.

As an additional precautionary measure, the necessity of immediate vaccination was urged upon the community through the daily newspapers, and notice given to all unable to pay that such service would be gratuitously performed by any of the several ward physicians of this corporation, and in the short period of five months no less than twenty-two hundred and eighty were attended to at an expense to the city of $1,140, or fifty cents in each case, in addition to the annual compensation of the physicians.

Since then the Councils, as necessarily required, have made appropriations of money for the enlargement of accommodations, and the care and treatment of such cases, and for that purpose have spent during this time $8,318 27, provided for the appointment of another medical officer, whose exclusive duty it is to attend to diseases of that kind, and taken care of all persons disposed to avail themselves of it, whether citizens or transients, and all followers and attaches of the Army other than enlisted men or volunteers.

Until lately the General Government made no provision of this kind for certain employees and attaches of the Army (unenlisted men) engaged in various capacities in and about the fortifications and other places; persons (soldiers) once in service and discharged, and contrabands (negroes) who having been in the service of individuals had forfeited its protection and were no longer entitled to be provided for by it.

These, together with the vast number of wives and children who followed their husbands and parents, and the thousands who flocked to this city in consequence of the war, filled both its small-pox and general hospital, (almshouse,) and caused the spread of the disease. Apprehensive that the approaching cold weather, as is ever the case with this disease, would prove an element of its spread, and anxious to protect, and as far as possible provide for the wants of the community, I addressed on the 14th of November last the Quartermaster General on the subject, and in response thereto received from the acting Quartermaster General the following letter:

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 21, 1863.

Sir: Your letter of the 14th instant to Brigadier General Rucker, calling attention to the fact that many of the Government employees, other than soldiers and contrabands, afflicted with small-pox are taken care of by the corporation, and requesting that some provision be made by the Government for taking care of such persons, was referred to this office on the 15th instant, with the following indorsement:

"Respectfully referred to the Quartermaster General.

"Employees of the Government, under my control, when attacked with small-pox have always been sent to the Kalorama hospital, and there taken care of.

(Signed),

"D. H. RUCKER,

"Brigadier General and Quartermaster."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. THOMAS,

Acting Quartermaster General.

RICHARD WALLACH, Esq., Mayor of Washington.

Fearful that the reply of that officer might not be satisfactory, I addressed within two days thereafter the Secretary of War, and received from the War Department the subjoined answer, from which you will perceive that not only has every possible precaution to prevent the spread of the contagion been taken, but likewise ample provision made for the care and treatment of all cases that may occur.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, November 30, 1863.

SIR: The Secretary of War directs me to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 16th instant, requesting that some provision may be made by the Government for the care of "contrabands" and others than soldiers who are or have been connected with the Army, or the camps and forts in the vicinity of this city, who are suffering with the small-pox, and for whose care the city authorities are unable to provide.

In reply, the Secretary instructs me to say that on application by the mayor, or his authorized assistants, to Surgeon Abbott, Medical Director, such small-pox patients as the corporation of this city is not able to provide for will be taken care of. This direction has been given in order to prevent the spread of the disease, as the Surgeon General reports that ample provision has been made for the care of all sick who have any claim upon the United States, whether white or colored soldiers, or employes.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ED. M. CANBY,
Brigadier General, A. A. G.

HIS HONOR R. WALLACH, Mayor Washington City, D. C.

Unfortunately there is no provision for that class of persons whose means enable them to dispense with the gratuity of the Federal Government or corporation, and as there is no power in either to force their removal to the hospitals, they remain in families in the most populated portions of the city, occasioning the spread of the disease and creating alarm.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

RICHARD WALLACH, Mayor.

HON. OWEN LOVEJOY, Chairman, &c., &c.

MR. LOVEJOY. I now report from the committee the following resolution, and I ask its adoption:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House it would be advisable, as a precautionary measure against the spread of small-pox in the District, for the city authorities of Georgetown and Washington to furnish to all the families in said cities the means of vaccination at their places of residence, and at the public expense where individuals are unable or unwilling to defray the expense as a private charge, and that they require such children as for any reason have failed to be vaccinated, to absent themselves from the public schools until they shall have complied with the requisitions of the city governments in this respect, and it is respectfully recommended to the authorities of said cities to take immediate action in this direction.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LOVEJOY, the Committee for the District of Columbia was discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

PAYMENT OF HOSPITAL DUES.

MR. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; and it was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for securing hospital dues from American vessels sold in foreign ports.

UNITED STATES MAILS.

MR. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the same committee.

MAILABLE ARTICLES.

MR. ALLEY. I am directed to report from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads a bill to amend the law prescribing the articles to be admitted into the mails of the United States, and to ask that it be put on its passage at once.

There was no objection, and the bill was received and read a first and second time.

The bill provides that articles of clothing, being manufactured of wool, cotton, or linen, and embraced in a package not exceeding two pounds in weight, addressed to any non-commissioned officer or private serving in the armies of the United States, may be transmitted in the mails of the United States at the rate of eight cents, to be in all cases prepaid, for every four ounces or any fraction thereof, subject to such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MR. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HON. GEORGE L. BECKER.

MR. WILSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the memorial of Hon. George L. Becker, of Minnesota, for compensation as a member or representative in Congress from that State, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it do lie upon the table; which motion was agreed to.

BRITISH SCHOONER GLEN.

MR. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to indemnify the owners of the British schooner Glen; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that there be paid to the owners of the British schooner Glen $17,150 66, the same being the amount awarded as indemnity to the parties interested by the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, for costs, damages, and expenses, by reason of illegal seizure of said vessel as a prize.

MR. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If objected to, the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but I think it ought to be considered and passed at once. I ask the Clerk to read the letter of the President.

The Clerk read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a copy of the decree of the court of the United States for the southern district of New York, awarding the sum of $17,150 66 for the illegal capture of the British schooner Glen, and request that an appropriation of that amount may be made as an indemnification to the parties interested.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WASHINGTON, January 7, 1864.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MR. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF NOAH WISWALL.

MR. JULIAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Noah Wiswall; which was read a first and second time.

The bill and report were both read.

MR. JULIAN. I ask that the bill be now put on its passage.

MR. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not see but that this is a just claim. Does it only refund $100 to these parties that was twice paid to the Government, without interest?

MR. JULIAN. The amount has been paid twice, and the bill provides for refunding it without interest.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MR. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SECOND ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR.

MR. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back Senate bill No. 50, to authorize the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War, with the recommendation that it do pass, and asked that it be considered at once. The bill provides that the President shall be authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the term of one year from the passage of this act, an officer in the War Department, to be called the Second Assistant Secretary of War, whose salary shall be $3,000 per annum, payable in the same manner as that of the Secretary of War, and who shall perform all such duties belonging to that Department as the Secretary of War shall prescribe or may be required by law.

MR. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, this bill has passed the Senate, and the Committee on Military Affairs of this House deem that there is an emergency requiring that it should be enacted into law. The history of the War Department in connection with this requirement is this:

An act was passed authorizing the appointment of an Assistant Secretary of War. Under it Mr. Watson was appointed, and is still serving. Some two years ago there was further legislation authorizing the appointment of two additional Assistant Secretaries, on account of the great labor thrown on that Department during the existing war. The term of these two officers was limited to one year. The year expired in the spring of 1863, now nearly a year ago. The Secretary of War was of opinion that he might be able to get along with such other assistance as he had in the Department, without having the act revived. He has made the attempt, and it proves to be, in his opinion, a failure. He therefore asks, not that two Assistant Secretaries shall be authorized as before, but that the office shall be revived only as to one of them. That is the object of this bill. It is proposed that there shall be now an additional Assistant Secretary, and that his term of service shall expire in one year from the passage of the act.

As I propose to call the previous question, I shall be glad before doing so to answer any further inquiry that members may desire to make in regard to this matter.

MR. KASSON. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs the only question that occurs to me as important in this matter, which does not relate to the service of some officer in such a capacity, but whether there are not military officers already in the pay of the Government, not employed in actual service, who might be properly employed in this capacity. I desire to know whether the Committee on Military Affairs has considered this question. There are some major generals and brigadier generals about Washington, as we have had occasion to observe, who do not seem to be actually employed in the military service of the Government.

MR. SCHENCK. I am perfectly aware of the fact that a considerable number of Army officers, of high grade, are now unemployed, and I am equally aware that it may become necessary, before our legislation is ended, if the remedy be not applied from some other quarter, to attempt to remedy that evil. But this bill is offered for the purpose of meeting an emergency which cannot well be provided for by the detail of an Army officer to this position. Colonel Hardee is now detailed to the duties. Major Vincent also gives his attention to a large number of subjects which would come within the province of an Assistant Secretary. There are other officers employed in like manner. These officers work from thirteen to fifteen hours a day, and are almost broken down by hard work in the endeavor to perform the duties of assistant secretary, who should combine, in some degree, civil functions with a knowledge of military affairs. The Committee on Military Affairs has come to the conclusion, from inquiry at the War Department, that one additional Assistant Secretary of War is required.

MR. STEVENS. I think that any person who has had much business at the War Department must see the necessity of the passage of this bill. We know that Mr. Watson, whom I think equal to anybody that can be appointed to that post, had his health nearly destroyed in office, and was obliged to retire last summer for a season. No one will say that he is not entirely competent and trustworthy. If Colonel Hardee could remain where he is, I think no better man could be selected. So far as I have seen, he is both capable and courteous; but it is not every military officer who is fit for a place of that kind. Some of them may be good fighters, but very little acquainted with the laws of the country, as I think an Assistant Secretary of War ought to be. I think that most of the officers who are not employed in active service are hardly fit for anything else if they are not fit for that. Therefore I would rather that a bill of this kind should be passed, so that a man may be selected who is acquainted with law as well as with business generally. I only rose, however, to inquire whether the salary provided in this bill is the lowest sum paid to the Assistant Secretaries of any of the other Departments? I think that at least one of them is paid $4,000.

MR. WASHBURN, of Illinois. One of them has $4,000 a year; all the others have $3,000. This bill provides for the lowest amount.

MR. SCHENCK. I now move the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the bill was read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS.

MR. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 57) declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois therein named; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 15) amendatory of the joint resolution to supply in part deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounties to volunteers.

SITTINGS OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House.

THE SPEAKER. The call of committees for reports of a private character being finished, reports are next in order of business of a public character, and under that call the House resumes the consideration of the resolution (H. R. No. 18) explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," which was laid over from yesterday.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. HOOPER. I ask leave of the House to introduce an amendment to the bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes. I do it at the request of the Committee of Ways and Means. It is a new section in place of section three of the bill, and I ask that it may be printed.

No objection being made, the amendment was presented, and ordered to be printed.

DAKOTA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to call up now, if the House will permit me, the contested-election case of Jayne and Todd, from Dakota Territory. It will take but a short time to dispose of it.

THE SPEAKER. It is a question of privilege, and the Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That William Jayne, having presented a certificate in due form of law of his election as Delegate from the Territory of Dakota to the Thirty-Eighth Congress, is entitled to take the oath of office and occupy a seat in this House as such Delegate, without prejudice to the right of J. B. S. Todd, claiming to be duly elected thereto, to prosecute his contest therefor, according to the rules and usages of this House.

Mr. SMITH. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to allow me to offer a resolution in reference to this matter, in order that his remarks upon the subject may be addressed to it.

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection.

The amendment, which was read, was to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That inasmuch as neither Mr. Todd nor Mr. Jayne, claimants from Dakota Territory, are admitted to a seat in this House, neither of them be sworn now, but the whole subject be referred back to the Committee of Elections for a report upon the merits of the case.

Mr. DAWES. The contest at this moment is, which gentleman shall occupy a seat here pending the contest upon the merits of the case. The Committee of Elections had this particular question referred to them upon the first day of the session, and the credentials upon which each of these gentlemen claims to be sworn in and to occupy a seat were referred to the committee. The committee have had that matter under consideration, and, without entering into the question of which of these gentlemen has actually been elected to the position, have instructed me to report that Mr. Jayne, having presented certificates in due form of law, is entitled to be sworn in and to occupy a seat during the contest.

I wish to state briefly the facts in the case, and then to leave it with the House. I think there can be no doubt, provided the House can decide which of them presented credentials here according to the forms of law, that he should be sworn in. I know of no more reason why both of them should be excluded from occupying a seat pending the contest than would prevail in the House touching any contest to a seat in this body. If any one contests the right of another member to a seat in this House, there is precisely the same reason that both should be excluded pending the contest as exists in this case. And if the facts set forth in the report be true, I think there can be no more doubt as to which of these parties presents a proper prima facie case than exists to the right of any other one to occupy a seat here until some person shows a better right.

Therefore I am opposed in the outset to this question being sent back to the committee, and to both of these parties being excluded from a seat in this House until that question be settled. If one or the other of them has a right to occupy a seat at this present moment—and it is either Mr. Todd or Mr. Jayne—I take it for granted the House is capable of deciding that question upon the papers. The election at which both of these gentlemen claim to have been elected to a seat here, and in reference to which both of them have presented documents which they call papers contesting the seat, was held on the 1st day of September, 1862, in conformity to the laws of the Territory of Dakota. The laws of the Territory have constituted the Governor, the chief justice of the Territory, and the secretary of the Territory, a board of canvassers, to canvass the votes for this office, and to make a proclamation of the result; and they have also required the Governor of the Territory, in addition to that proclamation of the result, to furnish to the gentleman whom they declare to be elected a certificate of this election.

It is required by the statute of the Territory that this canvass shall be made upon the expiration of fifty days after the day of election, or sooner than that time if all the returns are in. There is also a special provision that if the returns are not in from all the precincts within that time, on the fortieth day the secretary of the Territory shall send a special messenger to any precinct from which the returns may not have reached him. In this case there was no messenger sent by the secretary of the Territory to any precinct in the Territory; but after the expiration of the fifty days prescribed by the statute the secretary of the Territory and the chief justice of the Territory, two of the three canvassers—the Governor being one of the candidates at the election, and the statute providing that if one of the canvassers should be himself a candidate he should not participate in the canvass—canvassed the votes as they stood in the secretary's office, and found Mr. Jayne to be elected by 16 majority. The secretary of the Territory, in conformity with law, made proclamation of that fact, and declared Mr. Jayne to be elected, and this proclamation bears date the 29th day of November of the same year. The proclamation was made by the secretary as acting Governor, the Governor—Mr. Jayne himself—being absent from the Territory, and the organic law of the Territory devolving the duties of the office upon the secretary during his absence. The Governor returned to the Territory before the certificate of the fact of his election was issued to him. By the same organic law he then became Governor, and the authority of the secretary as acting Governor ceased.

When he returned to the Territory the statute required the Governor to give a certificate of the fact found by the canvassers. Mr. Jayne made a certificate of that fact, and signed it himself as Governor. Thus the matter stood until about nine months after that time, when this same secretary, without the assistance of either of the other canvassers, gave Mr. Todd a paper under his hand, and under the seal of the Territory, reciting a fact, namely: that though the majority for Mr. Jayne was 16, after the canvass was made, and after the fifty days allowed by the statute for returns to be made had elapsed, there came into his office returns from Pembina, which is a precinct a great distance from the capital of the Territory, and which is known, I believe, to the country and in history. These returns were of 125 votes for Mr. Todd, and 19 votes for Mr. Jayne. About six weeks after that, the secretary gave Mr. Todd another paper, stating that he had not given any certificate to any person, or affixed the seal of the Territory to any such certificate. Those are Mr. Todd's credentials. Mr. Jayne's are the proclamation of the secretary and acting Governor of the Territory, made in precise conformity to law, declaring him to have received a majority of the votes in accordance with law, and also declaring him to be elected Delegate from the Territory, and his own certificate, issued by himself in strict conformity to the letter of the law, stating the same facts. Mr. Todd presents only a statement from the secretary of the Territory, that subsequent to the time prescribed by law there came in these returns from Pembina, and also another paper stating that he had given no certificate to any other person.

This is the whole merit of the case. The Committee of Elections have entered into no investigation as to the genuineness of the vote from Pembina, about which there is much contest between the two gentlemen, and upon which, I suppose, the right to the seat may ultimately depend, the one alleging it to be a genuine vote, and the other alleging it to be entirely fictitious. It did not come within the scope of the inquiry of the committee, however, to examine that question at this preliminary stage. I therefore submit to the House that there can be no question on the prima facie case, and that Mr. Jayne is entitled to be sworn in.

I believe that Mr. Todd desires to address the House on this question, and I will, therefore, now yield the floor. When he has been heard, I propose to move the previous question.

Mr. SMITH. I regret to differ with the chairman of the Committee of Elections and with the majority of the committee in regard to this case. It is, however, a peculiar case, and one that deserves the serious consideration of the members of this House before they vote upon the question.

Now, sir, an election was held in the Territory of Dakota at the time prescribed by law. The returns of certain portions of the Territory were sent in to the secretary's office in proper time, and the secretary of the Territory, not having received the returns from one of the precincts or districts of the Territory, Pembina, proceeded, with one of the other commissioners authorized by law, to canvass the votes and to determine who was legally elected Delegate from the Territory.

The reason that the Pembina vote did not get in was on account of the Indian disturbances in that region, which cut off the communications. The law required, however, that returns not received by the secretary of the Territory in proper time should be sent for. That requirement was not complied with. Omitting the returns from Pembina which had not come in, and counting the rest of the returns, Mr. Jayne appeared to have a majority of 16, and the secretary of the Territory, in the absence of the Governor, issued a proclamation declaring that Mr. Jayne, having received a majority of 16, was elected Delegate in Congress from that Territory. The secretary also gave a certificate to Mr. Todd—it matters not when or how—that no seal had been attached by him to any certificate of election. The Governor of the Territory was absent when the canvass was made and when the proclamation was issued; but on his return, when he assumed the functions of Governor again, he issued a certificate to himself, sealing it with the seal of the Territory, which should be in the possession of the secretary, declaring himself duly elected Delegate in Congress from the Territory of Dakota. The secretary of the Territory issued to Mr. Todd a certificate, over his own signature, that he never knew of the seal being attached to any election certificate. Subsequently, or about that time, he certified to Mr. Todd that the vote of Pembina had reached the office and been counted, and that the whole returns showed that Mr. Todd had received a large majority over Mr. Jayne for the office of Delegate from the Territory.

The fact that the returns of Pembina were delayed was no fault of Mr. Jayne, or of Mr. Todd, or probably of any person interested. It was simply caused by the Indian disturbances in that region of country.

From the complicated character of the certificates on both sides, I have thought it proper, as far as I am individually concerned, to present the resolution which I have offered as an amendment to the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections. I think that the House should say to both these gentlemen that neither of them is shown by the papers presented to be entitled to a seat as Delegate, and that the whole matter should be referred back to the Committee of Elections for decision.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. As I was out of the Hall when the gentleman from Kentucky offered his amendment, I would be glad to understand its precise terms.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman's amendment to assume that there has been no election in Dakota Territory. I think that either of these gentlemen must have a prima facie case. If it be Mr. Jayne, I am for admitting him to a seat. If it be Mr. Todd, I am for admitting him. Either of them must have a prima facie case; this being merely a preliminary matter to determine who is entitled to be sworn in.

Mr. SMITH. I was coming to that point. It may probably turn out, on examination of the certificates, and of the testimony in the case, that neither of these gentlemen is entitled to a seat on this floor, and that the Committee of Elections can do nothing else than refer the whole matter back to the people of the Territory. It is in that view that I wish the case to be sent back to the Committee of Elections, so that the committee may determine on the merits of the case and decide whether either or neither of them is entitled to a seat on this floor.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the merits of the question now, but as I reside in the immediate vicinity of this Territory, I wish to make a single remark in regard to the wishes of its people. They are entitled to a representative on this floor, and in their behalf I protest against the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH.] Either one or the other of these gentlemen has a prima facie case, and is entitled to his seat; and the citizens of Dakota Territory are entitled to have the benefits and advantages of his representation. There are interests to be represented here of importance to the people of that Territory, and which demand immediate attention. I therefore hope that the amendment will be rejected.

Reference has been made to the Pembina vote. I do not think that that should control the action of the House. A canvass was made at the time prescribed by law, and in that canvass Mr. Jayne was declared duly elected Delegate of the Territory of Dakota, and holds the certificate of the Governor of the Territory to that effect. That certificate entitles him prima facie to a seat on this floor. On the other hand, Mr. Todd has no certificate either in substance or in form. He has no certificate even if Mr. Jayne were not here asking for a seat. Mr. Todd has no certificate that would entitle him to be sworn in as a member of this House.

This, Mr. Speaker, is all that I wish to say on the question at this time. I only rose for the purpose of urging upon the attention of the House the importance of admitting one of these men upon the floor, so that the citizens of Dakota Territory may be represented.

Mr. GANSON. What Governor was it that gave the certificate, and who attached the seal to the certificate of election?

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. It was the Governor of Dakota Territory, William Jayne, the only man under the laws who could issue that certificate. I will state further, and it appears in the report of the Committee of Elections, that Mr. Jayne holds a certificate in due form from the present Governor of Dakota Territory. That certificate is based upon the public records of the Territory—a certificate not only from the present acting Governor of the Territory, but one that is countersigned by the present secretary of the Territory, Mr. Hutchinson, the same man who gave those several certificates to General Todd.

Mr. GANSON. I am a member of the Committee of Elections, and have attended every meeting, and this morning was the first time that I heard any certificate had been given by the present Governor to Mr. Jayne. I do not know whether it came in before the action of the committee on the subject. I would ask the chairman how this is.

Mr. DAWES. If my colleague on the committee will read the report he will see that after the case was heard by them, the House referred to them another certificate given by the present Governor, and countersigned by the same secretary, John Hutchinson, bearing date December 26, 1863. That certificate is appended to the report. Now, if any power was left in these parties to make new papers—

Mr. GANSON. This certificate was referred after the committee had acted on the case.

Mr. DAWES. So the committee report.

Mr. GANSON. Therefore the position I took in the committee is correct, that the only certicate before the committee when they acted on this subject was the one which Mr. Jayne issued to himself, and upon which the seal of the Territory was not put by the custodian of that seal—not by the secretary of the Territory, but without his knowledge or consent.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from New York whether there is any law of Dakota Territory giving the custody of that seal to the secretary of the Territory?

Mr. GANSON. There is no law giving it to the Governor, but it is made the duty of the secretary to keep the records of the Territory, and consequently the seal of the Territory. This certificate has never been recorded in the Territory among the public records. I think that the evidence is pretty strong, and satisfies my mind that it was surreptitiously obtained, especially when a person certifies to his own election.

Mr. Speaker, I was in favor of leaving this matter until we had an examination into the merits of the case. The entire evidence has been introduced and referred to the Committee of Elections. It appears that the proclamation was issued by the secretary in regard to the election before the returns from this precinct had been made which changed the result. It further appears that the secretary omitted, as required by law if the returns were not made within forty days from the entire Territory, to send for them, and that the canvassers met, knowing that no returns had been made, and that they had not been sent for from that precinct. When they did come in they changed the result.

These certificates were all laid before the House the first day of the session, and I well recollect that the production of the certificate of Mr. Jayne, certified to by himself, caused merriment in the House, and I think that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HUBBARD] joined in it. I say that there was no proper certificate of election before the committee, and none before the House; and that when we look to the returns made, General Todd has a majority of the votes. Whether they are to be counted depends upon the testimony relating to the frauds which it is alleged occurred in some of the precincts. The committee have not investigated that. It took the ground that it would not. I think that the prima facie case is in favor of General Todd. The returns show that he has a majority of the votes cast in that Territory.

Mr. SMITHERS. Before the discussion proceeds further, I would be glad to have General Todd state his case, if he desires to do so.

Mr. DAWES. He has the right to do so.

Mr. GANSON. After stating the grounds upon which I dissented from the report of the committee, I intended to yield to General Todd. I wish simply to say that if anybody has a prima facie case it is not upon the certificate, in my judgment. And if we go beyond that, and look at the returns, that prima facie case is in favor of Mr. Todd, because he has a majority of the votes that were cast.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. My present impression would be that the proclamation issued by the acting Governor is a sufficient certificate to entitle the party holding it to be sworn in.

Mr. GANSON. By what law is it declared to be so?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who has the law in his possession, will read it for the benefit of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GANSON. By virtue of what law is that proclamation made evidence here of an election?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. By virtue of the law of the Territory.

Mr. GANSON. I do not understand that that amounts to a certificate at all.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. And all the remainder of the certificates are mere surplusage in this case. I think that is sufficient here to entitle the claimant to be sworn in.

Mr. GANSON. That proclamation is not declared by the statute of the Territory to be any evidence entitling a person to a seat. It is issued for an entirely different purpose.

And I will state that at the time it was issued returns had been made from this distant precinct, and they were on file at the time the proclamation was issued but not when the canvass was made, and the reason they were not included in the canvass was that the secretary failed to discharge a duty which was made imperative upon him; which was that if the returns were not made in forty days he should send for them. It is known here that there were disturbances there so that the returns could not reach the seat of government in forty days, and the person who was charged with the duty of sending for them should have sent a messenger for them, and when the canvassers met he should have stated that he had sent a messenger for the returns, and have requested them to defer their canvass. They did come in in four or five days after the canvass was made, and when they came in they changed the entire result.

For these reasons I am in favor of this Territory remaining unrepresented while this investigation is going on. I do not believe any great injustice will be done thereby, inasmuch as the committee have the entire testimony relating to the merits of the case.

Mr. TODD, (contestant.) Mr. Speaker, in addressing the House it is my purpose to engage its attention but for a few moments. The remarks which I shall submit will be confined closely to the matter under consideration; and I design to follow very nearly the line of argument adopted before the Committee of Elections while investigating the subject now pending, deferring to a future occasion the privilege of entering upon and discussing the broader field of the question involving the ultimate right to a seat in this House as the Delegate from the Territory of Dakota. The matter now before the House to be determined is, which of two claimants shall be sworn in and occupy the seat as sitting Delegate, pending the contest now before the Committee of Elections for its examination. This preliminary question is one of fact. No tangled web surrounds it; no shadows obscure it; no hidden secrets involve it in mystery. It is plain and simple, easy of solution.

Upon my credentials being presented, the Clerk of the House of Representatives placed my name upon the roll of members. These consisted of certain certificates, given by the secretary and acting Governor of Dakota. Mr. Jayne presented a proclamation issued by the acting Governor, and also a certificate of election, signed by himself, but not of record or duly sealed. Upon these exhibits the Clerk of the House decided, upon the internal evidence, that I, having the largest number of votes, duly certified, was entitled, prima facie, to the seat as the sitting Delegate. The House, however, decided to refer the whole subject to the Committee of Elections, without admitting either of us to be sworn. I now propose to examine these several papers, and will not ask that they be read, as they have been read already.

I claim the right to have the oath administered to me as the sitting Delegate, upon the papers and proofs submitted, for the following reasons:

The credentials presented by Mr. Jayne consist, first, of the proclamation of John Hutchinson, secretary and acting Governor of Dakota, (Governor Jayne being absent,) announcing the result of the election, held in Dakota on the 1st of September, 1862, in which he proclaims William Jayne duly elected Delegate to the Thirty-Eighth Congress. This proclamation bears date November 29, 1862; and second, Governor Jayne's certificate, issued to himself January 5, 1863. Upon these he bases his claims to a seat as Delegate in Congress from Dakota Territory, and asks that he be sworn to that place. I reply, that the proclamation was made as claimed, but that such proclamation confers no right, and of itself cannot clothe him with any authority. It may be introduced as evidence and treated as such, but cannot by the House be made the basis for a seat in this body. It is merely declaratory of a fact; but the existence of that fact does not depend upon the proclamation, but the certificate, issued by the proper authority, under the great seal of the Territory. The proclamation only notifies the people of the Territory of the result of the election, and for this purpose alone was it issued. It might be true or false; in neither case can it be resorted to for the purpose of sustaining or disproving a certificate of election, properly made out and authenticated.

It will be borne in mind that the point now before the House is, which of the claimants is entitled to the seat upon the papers now presented: Mr. Jayne relying upon the secretary's proclamation and the certificate issued by himself to himself; and I upon a certificate from the secretary and acting Governor after all the returns were received.

That the proclamation was made, and that it stated correctly the canvass of the vote at the time, is not denied. Such canvass, however, took place before all the returns were received and returned to the board of canvassers.

I desire here to present a letter addressed to the board of canvassers of the election returns in Dakota, objecting to the canvass being proceeded with and concluded until sufficient time had elapsed for the absent returns to be received, and will read it:

YANKTON, DAKOTA TERRITORY, October 21, 1862.

GENTLEMEN: Having been informed this morning by your board, at its first session, that all the returns of the late territorial election had been received from the different counties, with the exception of those from Pembina, I now submit that further time should be given for those returns to be received. The thirty-third section, chapter thirty-two, of the Code, requires the board of canvassers to meet on or before the fiftieth day after the election. That time having arrived, you have met according to the statute. The thirty-fourth section, same chapter, requires that if the returns of any county in this Territory shall not be received by the secretary of the Territory within forty days after the election, he shall forthwith dispatch a messenger to the clerk of the county whose returns have not been received, for a copy of them. This has not been done, as I am informed by the secretary. The import, by fair and reasonable construction of this section is, that due and reasonable time shall be given for this messenger to go and return to the county whose returns are wanting, and I object to the closing of the canvass until such time shall have been granted and elapsed. The county of Pembina is an essential element in this canvass, and the rights and privileges of its citizens should be so far respected as to afford them the opportunity of being represented by the returns.

It is well known that a cruel and relentless savage war rages upon the northeastern border of this Territory, disturbing, if not intercepting, the communication between Pembina and the capital, and that we have every reason to believe that the returns from that county have been delayed from this cause. Therefore it is eminently proper that this canvass should be delayed until sufficient time has elapsed for the communications to be adjusted or reopened and the returns received. And I have no doubt that they will still be here as soon as it is practicable for a messenger to pass through the country, and for these reasons I ask the canvass be not closed until such time.

The last advices from Pembina that I know anything about are to the 26th of August, in which it is stated the returns will be forwarded immediately after the election, and I attach the certificate of the postmaster of this place of the date of its postmark and its receipt here.

Gentlemen, it is not to be disguised that there is a deep-seated feeling in the minds of the people of Dakota in regard to your award of the certificate of election, in view of the great, glaring, and patent frauds which have been committed against the dignity of the Territory and the rights of individuals, and with you rests the responsibility.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. B. S. TODD.

To the Honorable the Board of Canvassers of the Territorial Election of Dakota Territory, Yankton, D. T.

The secretary of the Territory failed to comply with the thirty-fourth section, thirty-second chapter, of the laws of Dakota, which requires him to dispatch a messenger to the clerk of the board of county commissioners within forty days after the election, in case the returns are not received. The object of this law is to prevent any canvass by the board until all the returns were received; and the candidate duly elected cannot be deprived of his seat by the neglect of the secretary to perform a duty enjoined upon him by law.

The proclamation, then, was not issued upon the canvass and result of all the votes, but only upon the canvass and result of partial returns, and hence was imperfect and incomplete. Upon such canvass Mr. Jayne is declared elected by a majority of 16 votes. It is therefore submitted whether Mr. Jayne can rely at all upon the proclamation for the purpose of strengthening his own certificate of election, and whether the House must not determine the issue in the first instance upon the question raised by the two certificates. How, then, stands the case when tried by the standard of the certificates? The certificate of Mr. Jayne bears date January 5, 1863. This is signed by William Jayne, Governor of Dakota, and issued to William Jayne, declaring him duly elected as Delegate to the Thirty-Eighth Congress. It would be charitable to presume that William Jayne, Governor, and William Jayne, Delegate, were two different and distinct persons, as it could hardly be supposed that a man occupying the exalted position of Governor would so far forget himself as to become the author of his own certificate in a closely contested election. I repeat that such would be the presumption if not forced to a different conclusion by the fact that no other man of the name of Jayne was the Governor of Dakota, or was ever a candidate for Delegate from that Territory. The two are one and identical.

Governor Jayne, then, issues the certificate, upon which he relies for his seat, to himself. This, I affirm, he could not do unless he procured the secretary of the Territory to attach the seal, and then it would be manifestly improper—"chacun à son goût." The certificate, to be valid, must have the seal of the Territory attached. The secretary is the custodian of seals, his office the depository of it, and no other person has the right to use it. He, and he alone, is responsible for its use, and if surreptitiously obtained and the impression made without his knowledge and sanction, such fact being made to appear, the document thus falsely sealed is not sealed at all, and of course void as a sealed instrument. This certificate is not attested or countersigned by the secretary. The organic act of Dakota, section three, requires the secretary to "record and preserve all the acts and proceedings of the Governor in his executive department."

The Secretary, under date of September 26, 1863, certifies that he had issued no certificate of election to any person as Delegate from Dakota, that there was no record in his office of any such certificate having been issued, and that he had no official knowledge of the seal of the Territory having been affixed to any such certificate. How then came the seal upon Mr. Jayne's certificate? The secretary did not place it there, yet he was the only person who had authority to do so.

There is no record of the certificate, no record of the seal, and no such certificate has ever been issued or recorded by the secretary. It is true Mr. Jayne issued a certificate to himself. But where did he obtain the seal? As Governor the seal does not belong to him, nor is it under his control, and most certainly not for the purpose of authenticating documents issued to himself.

Painful as it is to contemplate, I am reluctantly forced to the conclusion that Governor Jayne not only issued the certificate to himself, but, without the knowledge of the secretary of the Territory, obtained the seal of the Territory, and attached it to his own certificate. Upon this certificate he asks to be invested with all the rights and privileges of a Delegate in Congress. Had there been the slightest necessity for such conduct on the part of the Governor; this great breach of executive propriety might be palliated; but such was not the case. When the proclamation was issued, November 29, 1862, and signed by the secretary, as acting Governor, why was not the certificate then issued to Mr. Jayne, as mandatory by our law, section thirty-three, chapter thirty-two, or, if not then, why not afterwards? For it was not only most clearly proper for the secretary, as acting Governor, to issue the certificate of election to Mr. Jayne, providing he was elected, but it was his duty to do so. Why, I repeat, does Mr. Jayne assume to act in his case, declare himself elected, issue his own certificate, procure the seal without the knowledge or consent of the secretary, authenticate his own certificate, when there was no necessity for all this? Only one conclusion can solve this strange conduct of the Governor, and that is that the delayed returns having been received changed the result as announced by proclamation, and, shunning the test of truth, he took the nearest and surest road to the object of his aspirations by issuing his own certificate to himself. It is true the law contemplates the issuance of certificates by the Governor; but surely not when he is a party interested. This is one of those exceptional cases not provided for by law. As well might the judge upon the bench sit in judgment upon his own conduct or decide a case in his own favor, or the marshal execute a writ upon himself for his own arrest, as the Governor to confirm his own acts by which he was to derive benefit and advancement, the law being equally directory in these several cases.

Such being the condition of the certificate of Mr. Jayne, how is it in relation to my own? Be its character as it may, construe it as you will, it is issued by the proper authority—the secretary of the Territory and acting Governor. It is duly sealed; it comes from a disinterested officer in the discharge of official duty. It is dated August 15, 1863—it is true nearly a year after the election; but as the Thirty-Eighth Congress did not convene for some months after this is immaterial, and if issued in time to take my seat, then it is sufficient. From the certificate it will be seen that my majority is 90 votes. This certificate is issued after the receipt of all the returns, and must prevail over that held by Mr. Jayne, issued to himself, upon a canvass of only partial returns.

As an additional reason for claiming this seat, and certainly one which will have great weight with the House, I invite attention to the contested case from Nebraska before the Thirty-Seventh Congress. Mr. Morton held the first, and of course elder, certificate, issued by the Governor in due form. It was based upon the report of the board of canvassers declaring him duly elected. Many months after the issuance of this certificate the Governor issued another certificate, without further canvass, upon his own volition, and gave it to Mr. Daily. In this certificate the Governor assigns his reasons for giving it.

There is only this difference between the contested case of Nebraska and the one before the House from Dakota. This difference is an important one in support of the position I assume, and I ask attention to it. In the one, Governor Black issued the first certificate after all the returns were received and canvassed, and justifies himself for issuing the second on the ground that a portion of the returns before the board of canvassers was a fraud throughout. In the case from Dakota, the first certificate was issued upon incomplete returns, and the second one recites this fact, and shows my majority to be 90 votes, as ascertained from full returns.

It will thus be seen that the present case is much stronger in support of the position I assume than was that from Nebraska in favor of the claim of Mr. Daily, who held the junior certificate. In his case the Governor, upon his own volition, sets aside the vote of a precinct counted by the board of canvassers for Mr. Morton; and in the present case the acting Governor includes the vote of a district which was not before the board of canvassers at the time of the canvass, but which when received changed the result of the count. In one case the vote of a precinct was rejected; in the other the returned vote was counted. Yet the House of the Thirty-Seventh Congress gave Mr. Daily his seat, holding as he did the junior certificate, based upon the opinion of the Governor that the board of canvassers had included a fraudulent vote in awarding Morton's certificate. Upon precedent and parity of reason the House cannot but award me a seat, claimed by virtue of a junior certificate, based upon complete returns made to the secretary of the Territory in conformity with law.

For these and kindred reasons which will suggest themselves to the consideration of the House, I submit the case to it in the full assurance that its decision will be governed in a spirit of equity and with wisdom.

MR. SMITHERS. I desire to ask the gentleman how he claims that the certificate of John Hutchinson of the mere fact of the number of votes dated on the 15th of August, 1863, is a certificate of election, when the same John Hutchinson, on the 26th of September, certified that he had never issued any certificate to anybody?

MR. TODD. In the argument I made before the committee, I did not claim that the certificate I presented was in due form of law. I also denied that the certificate of Jayne was in due form of law, and it was so conceded.

MR. DAWES. I demand the previous question. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

MR. DAWES. I have one word to say now in reply, as I am entitled to close the debate after the main question is ordered.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] and the member from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH], both members of the committee, and the contestant, place this matter upon the ground that there is no official evidence here that can be taken notice of by the House of the election of Mr. Jayne as Delegate from that Territory. I call the attention of the House to what the secretary, the acting Governor, says in obedience to the law upon that subject. The law says that in this case the secretary and chief justice shall, upon the expiration of fifty days from the day of election, canvass the votes. Of course they must canvass the vote as they stood upon the fiftieth day. Their duty is prescribed by law, and that is to canvass the votes as they stood upon that day. No vote coming in after that day can they, by any provision of law, take notice of. The question is whether we have any evidence that, according to the provision of law in Dakota, this man Jayne had a majority of the votes. The law makes it the duty of the secretary, then acting Governor, to declare the result, and this is what he says:

"I, John Hutchinson, secretary and acting Governor of the Territory of Dakota, do hereby proclaim that at a general election—"

Mr. SMITH, (interrupting.) I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question: whether the law of the Territory of Dakota is that the canvassers shall act upon that particular day, or shall proceed to canvass on that day?

Mr. DAWES. The law says:

"It shall be the duty of the secretary of the Territory, with the chief justice—"

I leave out the Governor—

"or a majority of them, to proceed within fifty days after the election, and sooner if the returns be received"—

But it shall be their duty at any rate within fifty days after the election—

"to canvass the votes given for Delegates to Congress, and other territorial officers."

Mr. SMITH. I would ask the gentleman whether by that language these commissioners are required to close the canvass within fifty days, or if it is not their privilege to go on until the canvass is completed?

Mr. DAWES. I take it that if it is their duty to proceed within fifty days it is their duty to proceed upon the canvass as it stood upon the fiftieth day; that fifty days are given for returns to be made; and that returns made after the expiration of the fifty days are out of time; and that whether those returns shall be counted or not here before the ultimate tribunal, is a question upon the merits of which the House must decide, as also upon the character of the returns themselves. But the officers of the Territory had no other duty to perform but to canvass the votes returned within the fifty days. There can be no question about that. And then it is made the duty of the acting Governor to proclaim the result. The language of the law is, "and shall also issue a proclamation declaring the election of such person."

Mr. SMITH. Suppose there had been a disturbance at the capital of Dakota at the time the commissioners ought to have been in session to canvass the votes, to such an extent that they could not meet on that day, and no returns had come in in consequence of the disturbance; could they not at a subsequent period have proceeded to determine the election?

Mr. DAWES. No doubt if there had been a disturbance at the capital of the Territory, so that the canvassing officers could not discharge their duty, neither of these parties would have been here with evidence of their action on that day, and they must have made out the best case they could before the committee and the House; but as there was no disturbance at the capital, or in the Territory, and there being no evidence and no pretense that there was such disturbance, it is entirely a matter of suggestion on the part of my friend from Kentucky, and it is hardly within the province of the Committee of Elections or of the House to speculate on what would have been the condition of things had there been such disturbance in the Territory that the officers could not do their duty. Fortunately for this case the officers did do their duty and had no obstacle or disturbance in the way of their doing it fully.

Mr. SMITH. Then, if it is true in regard to the capital or to the whole Territory, I would ask the gentleman if the rule does not apply to the district of Pembina, where there were such disturbances that the vote could not be sent in in time?

Mr. DAWES. I shall have a word to say upon that subject if my friend does not use up my hour. I have read the law of the Territory, and it is the same as the organic law, which provides that the acting Governor shall proclaim who has been elected after these canvassers shall have met on the fiftieth day and examined the votes. And in this case the acting Governor says:

"I, John Hutchinson, secretary and acting Governor of the Territory of Dakota, do hereby proclaim that at a general election held on the 1st day of September, 1862, in said Territory, William Jayne received a majority of the votes cast for Delegate to Congress, and was therefore duly elected Delegate to the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States."

He proclaims that fact, and he proclaims it in obedience to law. It was his duty to proclaim it. What for? That he whom it concerned might take notice of the fact.

Now, the contestant (Mr. Todd) says that that does not constitute the fact that he was elected, but he says that it is evidence of the fact. I admit that it does not constitute the fact, but these men were appointed to ascertain a prima facie title and to certify the fact; but the contestant says that the certificate is the fact itself; that is to say, that if he held the certificate that would be conclusive upon us. Neither the one nor the other makes the fact.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if the committee found it necessary to go into evidence of the fact why they did not go into all the evidence, and give us the case on the merits.

Mr. DAWES. For the plain reason that the House referred these certificates to the Committee of Elections to pass upon this very point. They propose at some future day to enter into the merits and to sift these Pembina returns to the satisfaction, I trust, of both these contestants and of the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question for information. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he holds that the law would require the board of canvassers to proceed to canvass the votes within the fifty days. Now, suppose that but one precinct in the Territory should have made its return within the fifty days, would it be the duty of the board of canvassers to canvass the vote of that precinct and declare an election, and would the person thus declared to be elected be entitled to a seat here although after the fifty days had expired the balance of the Territory may have sent in returns which may be on file in the office of the secretary of the Territory and which would change the result of the election?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, no man would be entitled to a seat here on any such state of facts as that. I might suggest to my friend a supposable case in his own district which would have just as much foundation in fact as that which he suggests in regard to this case. But there is no such case here. I take it that it is the duty of the Committee of Elections, when they enter on the examination of the merits of the case, to find out which of these parties received a majority of all the legal votes cast, and to see to it, so far as that committee is able, that the House give to that man, and to none other, the seat. But the question is now which of them is entitled to a seat until the final action of the House on the merits of the case.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman from Massachusetts misunderstood my question. The point I want to get at is this: whether, if all the precincts but one had sent in their returns, or if only one out of all had sent in its return, that would change the principle of the case.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I will be obliged to husband the rest of my time; but I think I have answered the gentleman. If he calls upon the canvassers of the Territory to perform their duty, he must look to the laws of the Territory and see what that duty is. If the duty imposed upon them is to canvass such votes as are returned within fifty days, they have discharged their duty when they have canvassed such votes.

I was asking the House to listen to what the acting Governor, John Hutchinson, in obedience to the law, has proclaimed to all the world—that all the world may take notice thereof—that William Jayne had a majority of the votes cast, and was duly elected. He does not state how much the majority was, nor is he required by law to do so. But he is required by law to declare by proclamation which of the parties is elected, and he has so declared. Now, suppose there was no certificate beyond that. The gentleman contestant is very much offended in his sense of propriety because the Governor afterwards made out a certificate of the fact to himself. He says he could not do it. Well, even if he could not, what would be the state of the case? Here would be the legal official proclamation of the fact under the hand of the acting Governor and with the seal of the Territory; and that, he says, is evidence of the fact. Now, can he deprive William Jayne of the benefit of that position? Suppose nobody had given him a certificate. This proclamation is precisely that evidence which the members from Maryland brought here at the commencement of the session, and which, by a large vote, the House declared sufficient to entitle them to take their seats as members. It was a proclamation of the Governor of Maryland, and nothing more, that these five men had received a majority of the votes, and were duly elected. The only title they have to their seats here is exactly such a proclamation as John Hutchinson made to all the world that Mr. William Jayne was elected.

Mr. TODD, (contestant.) I ask the chairman of the Committee of Elections to have the goodness to state the words of the law. The law says that the certificate shall be made by the Governor, and also a proclamation of the fact. Hence the proclamation itself is not the evidence in the case. The certificate is made the evidence; and the proclamation follows. By all fair and just construction no other import can be given to the law.

Mr. DAWES. I was supposing, Mr. Speaker, that the acting Governor, or anybody having authority to give a certificate, should refuse to do so; and then I said that the gentleman, Mr. Jayne, would be here precisely as the Representatives from Maryland are here, and whose merits were presented to the House by a proclamation read at the Clerk's desk. It is precisely that case; not a particle of difference. Now, without any certificate, it would be perfect; but does a poor certificate hurt it? Does a certificate which nobody ought to have given hurt it? Certainly not. The law says the Governor shall give a certificate. The law also says that nobody else shall give it. The law made William Jayne Governor when he got back to the Territory. Who else could give the certificate but William Jayne? The contestant says it is a casus omissus—that there is no provision of law for anybody to give a certificate. I take that to be the case. Then he is here with everything the law requires of him. He is here with the proclamation of the acting Governor, given while William Jayne was out of the Territory. And when William Jayne came back into the Territory nobody but himself could give a certificate. He therefore comes here with all that the law requires of him and all that the law could give him. William Jayne performed nothing but ministerial duty in giving the certificate. He did not pass upon the returns. He did not pass upon the number of votes. He certified merely what others had canvassed.

Is it the first time that a man has certified to what others have done touching his own case? Does not the register certify to the record of his own deed? Cannot a president of a corporation give himself certificates of stock in his corporation when the law requires the president to sign the certificates of stock? When there is a ministerial duty to be performed by a man there is no impropriety in his performing it, whether it refers to himself or to anybody else. There was nothing pertaining to this canvass in the Territory in which Mr. Jayne interfered, but, as the Governor of the Territory, it was conceded by the contestant and everybody else he was the sole person who could give this certificate. If that certificate is required the law is fulfilled, and if it is not required the law is fulfilled.

What came after this? Who certified that there are any other votes but those which have been passed upon? The law required the canvassers to do this, but the canvassers have never done it. John Hutchinson assumes to tell J. B. S. Todd that there were votes there, but John Hutchinson was not authorized to say that by the law. It is true that the board of canvassers have never attempted to canvass those votes returned afterwards. So that there is no evidence, not a particle of evidence according to the requirements of law that we can take notice of, that there is a single vote from Pembina.

Mr. GANSON. I ask whether it was not conceded by both sides that those votes were returned.

Mr. DAWES. I understand my friend part of the time to argue this according to the provision of law, and I will not say that the rest of the time he travels out of it. I submit that there is not, and never has been, any evidence before the committee or the House, no evidence contemplated by the law, that there was a vote cast in Pembina. The reason I say so is this: the law says that three canvassers, or a majority of them, and they alone, shall state it. John Hutchinson had no more business to say that than he had, on the 25th of December, 1863, to make the certificate which is appended to the report of the committee. The last act of John Hutchinson in this, not drama, but in this farce, after taking a survey of the field of his duty, was on the 25th of December, 1863, the last Christmas we have had, to certify that Mr. Jayne, and he alone, has been elected, and to put the great seal on it, and my friend says that he is the sole custodian of the seal of the Territory.

Mr. GANSON. Was it not conceded that those votes were cast, and is that not some evidence?

Mr. DAWES. My friend knows that I cannot disclose what took place in the committee room, as that would be a violation of rules. While he and I are trying to argue this case as well as we can upon the papers, I will suggest to him that nobody said anything more than this, that the paper purporting to contain so many votes, namely: 125 for Todd and 19 for Jayne, was put into the secretary's hands after it was ascertained how many were required to make the majority the other way. That is all that was conceded, and that is all that can be conceded.

One word more about the seal which Mr. Jayne used. It is stated that Mr. Jayne had no authority to use this seal. There is no requirement of law to put that seal upon the certificate. It was a work of supererogation, but, being a beautiful one, we have it in these papers five times over. The board were functus officio after having discharged their duties as canvassers in this case, and they became humble citizens of Dakota Territory. That is all there is of it. There is no law requiring the Governor or the secretary to keep the seal. I suggest that one or the other shall take it and use it, or have the custody of it. They have not done it, and I do not wonder that they both have a right to use it.

Mr. Speaker, this is a case like that from Nebraska last year. I can refer to the position of as many of the members of the Committee of Elections as were then here, that after those canvassers performed their duty, and gave a certificate according to the requirements of law, as was done in that case as well as in this, they had performed their whole duty. When we take into consideration the facilities in new Territories, if we allow constant modifications of their returns, the whole thing will be as changeable as the fleeting clouds of April. We would never know when the election had been determined. While we are settling this case here the secretary assumes the right to send us a new certificate, dated 25th of December, 1863, as to the whole facts. Perhaps before the committee pass on the merits of the case we shall have still another one. There is no telling what Protean shapes the case may assume.

The Committee of Elections present the authoritative proclamation of the secretary, under the seal of the Territory, that William Jayne has been elected. If you want anything more, we present a new certificate signed by both the Governor and this same secretary a little more than fifteen days ago, declaring not only that Jayne was elected, but, in the language of my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. DEMING,] that nobody else was.

Mr. TODD. One question to the gentleman from Massachusetts. Was not that certificate, dated the 25th of December, 1863, issued by the Governor of the Territory, sealed with the seal of the Territory, and countersigned by the secretary?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly it was; and the certificate from Nebraska, to which the gentleman referred, was signed by the Governor alone, and had neither the signature of the secretary nor the seal of the Territory.

Mr. TODD. I only wish to call the attention of the chairman to the fact that he stated that the certificate was issued by the secretary. It was issued by the Governor, and sealed and countersigned by the secretary.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly. I suppose they thought they would stop all cavil this time; but I submit that the certificate presented by Mr. Morton last Congress, for which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and myself voted, was a certificate signed by the Governor alone, and had neither the seal nor the secretary's name upon it.

The question recurring upon the amendment offered by Mr. SMITH,

Mr. SMITH called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 66, nays 78; as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. COBB stated that Mr. SLOAN was detained from the House by severe illness in his family.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, stated that Mr. L. MYERS was absent from the House for the same reason.

Mr. ODELL stated that Mr. STEBBINS was absent on account of illness.

The resolution offered by the committee was then agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. JAYNE then appeared at the Clerk's desk and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. I move that when this House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to inform the House that Mr. LITTLEJOHN has been absent from the House almost the entire time since its organization in consequence of severe sickness, and it will probably be some weeks before he will be able to resume his seat here. I ask the House to grant to Mr. LITTLEJOHN indefinite leave of absence.

Leave of absence was granted.

PAY OF OFFICERS IN WESTERN DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MCCLURG. I move that the House now proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to; and the House proceeded to consider the only business on the Speaker's table, being an amendment of the Senate to a bill of the House (No. 35) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri.

The amendment, which was to insert after the word "valid," in the fifteenth line, the words, "such payments to be made by the paymasters of the United States Army," was agreed to.

Mr. MCCLURG moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, (at forty-five minutes past two o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 16, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of the crier and bailiffs attached to the various courts for the District of Columbia, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORGAN presented the memorial of Captain F. E. Prime, of the corps of engineers United States Army, praying relief for the loss of a sum of money belonging to the Government, stolen from his office by the rebels during their raid on Holly Springs, Mississippi, December 20, 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a memorial of persons of foreign birth residing in New York, who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, remonstrating against the enrollment act as it affects foreigners who have declared their intention to become citizens; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented the memorial of William Cook, of Decatur county, Indiana, praying for arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of William S. Speer, late United States consul at Zanzibar, praying for compensation for his services; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed the following bill and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 57) declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois therein named; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 15) amendatory of the joint resolution to supply in part deficiencies in the appropriations for the public printing, and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for bounties to volunteers.

RECOMMITMENT OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, the bill (S. No. 45) to set apart a portion of the State of Texas for the use of persons of African descent was taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Territories.

AMENDMENT TO ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. WILSON. As there does not seem to be any further morning business, I move the postponement of all other subjects, and that the Senate take up the bill amendatory of the enrollment act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves the postponement of all other business for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill which will be the order at one o'clock as the unfinished business of yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. LANE.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. I stated yesterday, Mr. President, that I believed the commutation money that was paid in did not operate as a release in any degree to the State with reference to the quota of troops called for. I stated also that that was my impression with regard to the law, and that if a different construction had prevailed at the War Department, I believed their construction to be erroneous. I had not, as I then said, examined the law particularly; but such was my very strong impression, as it was the impression of some other Senators. Last evening, however, I took the pains to examine it, and I learned the truth of a maxim which I was taught early in my professional career, and that was never to give an opinion on a statute without having it before me. I have examined it carefully, and I have come to the conclusion that my opinion expressed to the Senate yesterday was decidedly erroneous, and that the construction which has been put upon the law at the War Department is the correct construction. I wish therefore to apologize to my friend from Indiana [Mr. LANE] for contesting so strongly the opinion he had expressed without having looked more particularly at the statute. The thirteenth section of that statute provides that "any person drafted and notified to appear as aforesaid may, on or before the day fixed for his appearance, furnish an acceptable substitute to take his place in the draft"—that of course diminishes the quota so much—"or he may pay to such person as the Secretary of War may authorize to receive it, such sum, not exceeding $300, as the Secretary may determine, for the procuration of such substitute, which sum shall be fixed at a uniform rate," &c.

I think it impossible to put upon that language any other construction than that the Secretary of War on receiving the money is to procure the substitute, and that the payment of the money must operate so far as a release to the State for that particular individual who has thus paid it. It is a substitution of the money for the soldier, and the substitute is to be procured at the risk of the War Department. I think, therefore, as I said before, that no other construction than that put upon the statute by the War Department could be the correct one.

I do not agree, however, with the opinion expressed by the Senator from Indiana that this operates upon other States where the money is not paid but where the men are procured; that is to say, it does not so operate in practice. The amount paid in is $300. The Secretary of War very properly considered himself as authorized to offer the whole amount of that money for a substitute in the case of veterans—he might have offered any sum he chose not exceeding that—and to add to it the $100 which is provided by law for all volunteers and for all drafted men. It will be noticed that under this statute men who are drafted are entitled to the same $100 bounty provided by law for volunteers, if I have read the statute aright. The Secretary of War therefore offered to veteran volunteers the $100, which is to be paid at all events, and $300 additional, which is the substitute money; but he did not offer so much to raw recruits. To them he offered the $100 provided by law and $200 of the $300 paid in as commutation money. Consequently, so far as he procured raw recruits he saved $100 in point of fact, because $300 was paid in by each person drafted and only $200 of that money was paid out; and to that extent, to the extent that new men were procured, so much was saved.

That in point of fact the men have been made up is proved by the fact that the money has all been expended; for we were called upon very early in the session to appropriate $20,000,000 in addition, because the sum was wanted; the $12,000,000, more or less, paid in for substitutes had all been exhausted; that is to say, the number had been procured which would exhaust it if it had actually been paid. Consequently the payment of the money, so far as it has gone—what it may be in the future I cannot tell—has operated in no way injuriously to any State which has produced the men, because substitutes have been procured by the money thus paid in; and thus, to that extent, the quota of the State where the money was paid has been made up. I do not think, therefore, that the consequences which were portrayed by my friend from Indiana so vividly with reference to a difference between the States, have followed. Whether they will be likely to follow in the future or not, I am unable to say. That will depend upon future operations, how far the matter may be extended.

I see, on reflection, the difficulties that arise in reference to this whole subject, and I cannot but be glad that the misapprehension of mine had the effect to call attention to it more particularly, in order that, so far as it can, it may be remedied by an amendment which will apply to the whole subject; and I understand that an amendment has been prepared which will do so. I have deemed it due to the Senate, as I was somewhat strenuous in the expression of my opinion yesterday, to be equally explicit in withdrawing it now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr.

LANE, of Indiana, which was to insert at the end of the section adopted on the motion of Mr. SHERMAN the words:

And provided further, That the money paid for commutation within any State shall be expended to procure substitutes for persons drafted within such State, and the payment of commutation money by any drafted person shall not operate to release the State in which he was drafted from filling its quota, but the draft shall proceed in such State until its quota is filled.

Mr. COLLAMER. I merely suggest that that word "State" had better not be used in this connection. The act of enrollment carefully avoided the use of the word "State." It was not to be put upon the footing of the militia; it was all done by districts. The military districts were made the congressional districts, and nothing was said about States. It was to be in the districts of the several States.

Mr. CLARK. I have prepared a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, which I have shown to the chairman of the Military Committee, and to some other gentlemen, and also to the Senator from Indiana, which I will read. It is to insert as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the commutation money paid by persons drafted in any congressional district shall be applied by the War Department for the procuration of substitutes, which substitutes shall be credited to that district in filling its quota; and if the quota of such district shall not then be full, a further draft shall be made in said district according to the provisions of this act and the act to which it is in amendment, and like proceedings had until the quota of such district shall be filled.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I prefer the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, and with the permission of the Senate I will withdraw my amendment, that his may be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can withdraw his amendment, no action having been taken upon it by the Senate. The question, then, before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to hear it read. The Secretary read the amendment, to insert as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the commutation money paid by persons drafted in any congressional district shall be applied by the War Department for the procuration of substitutes, which substitutes shall be credited to that district in filling its quota; and if the quota of such district shall not then be full, a further draft shall be made in said district according to the provisions of this act and the act to which it is in amendment, and like proceedings had until the quota of such district shall be filled.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I cannot support the principle of my colleague's amendment. I recollect that the strongest objection made before the people to the law of last session was that by allowing a portion of the drafted men to pay money instead of rendering personal service, you but increased the liability to draft of those that did not pay the money; and that was answered somewhat successfully before the people by saying that the payment of the money discharged the obligation of the State to furnish the quota, and therefore the liability of those that could not pay the money was not increased. But this proposition is that when a man pays his money it shall not go to the credit of the State upon the demand made against her, but that the number of men shall remain the same, to be taken from the people. Suppose that from one State thirty thousand men are required; a draft of thirty thousand is made; fifteen thousand pay their money of those that are drafted; fifteen thousand cannot pay the money; and upon the enrollment there is another fifteen thousand that are not yet drafted, and who cannot pay their money. Then we have to raise the entire number of men from that class of the community that are too poor to pay the money at all.

The principle of the legislation of the last Congress was that by the payment of the money the Government procured a substitute and the men were raised, and there was no increase of liability upon those who could not pay the money; they were precisely in the same position that they would have been in if there had been no commutation at all. But now, notwithstanding the Government receives the money, we throw upon the truly poor men the responsibility to furnish the men, and the money is but a revenue. The money is not treated by this proposition as a means of furnishing to the Government a substitute, but it is treated as a revenue, and the demand upon the State to furnish the men continues as large as if the money had not been paid. I am not willing to vote for any such proposition, and I suggest to Senators that it will subject the measure to very great hostility in the country.

Mr. CLARK. I think the objection of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] lies with very much more force against what was the amendment of the other Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] than against the amendment which I propose. The amendment which I propose is that the War Department shall take the money paid by the men who are drafted and apply it, as far as it goes, to the procuration of substitutes. It may possibly, by the employment of Africans, get them for $100, and then it would get four for the $400, and credit that district with the four, and so relieve the poor men of the district very much. It provides that the Government shall expend the money for the procuration of substitutes and credit those substitutes to that district, no more. If it gets one hundred substitutes they are credited; if it gets two hundred they are credited. The Government will undoubtedly do the best it can in procuring substitutes, and so relieve the men of the district. And as the Government wants men I do not see that there is any better provision for the purpose. We must have the men, and it is fair that the district should have its money appropriated to procure substitutes, and it is fair for the rest of the country that that district should furnish the residue of the men.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator from New Hampshire, before he closes, allow me to ask him how his idea can be made a practical one? The money is paid during the progress of the draft, and it goes into the hands of the Government. It certainly will be a very considerable time before the Government can secure substitutes by the use of that money. When the money goes into the Treasury I do not see how you can identify the particular substitute that is paid for by it. Is it a practical scheme? Can it be made so?

Mr. CLARK. That same objection in regard to the time will lie against the whole bill. It takes time to enforce the draft. It takes time to call out volunteers. It will take some time to get the substitutes, but it takes just as much time to get them by the law as it now stands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I perceive the Senator does not understand the point of my inquiry.

Mr. CLARK. I am coming to the other point.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The draft is going on, and as the money is paid is it to go to the credit of the district, or do you require the draft to proceed until you get the number required from that district? Suppose that at this time there is a draft going on in a district which is to furnish one thousand men, and five hundred of them pay the commutation money, will you stop the draft until the Government shall make an effort to procure substitutes for those five hundred men, or will you go on and draw until you get the one thousand?

Mr. CLARK. I understand that the draft will stop until substitutes are procured; and so it is now, I understand, because the money is to be applied for "the procuration of substitutes." As to the other point, that this money cannot be identified, I have only to say that of course it will be known to the Government just how many men commute in a given district; it will be known just how much money is paid from that district, and if the identical money is not used a like sum can be employed for the purpose until the money is exhausted; and the Government must use its diligence in doing that.

Mr. BROWN. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire one question, and I do so because I concur with him in the desire to get the men and not the money. If I understand the bill, it provides that the amount of the commutation money shall be paid over to the Secretary of War to be by him expended in the procuration of substitutes. Now, under the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, here is a district called upon to furnish one thousand men. Five hundred pay the commutation money. That money goes into the hands of the Secretary of War. He is procuring substitutes generally. Now, how is the Secretary of War going to assign the number of substitutes that he gets throughout the United States in various quarters? Is he going to assign some of them to this district and some of them to another, or are the substitutes to be recruited within that district? There is a question that is going to involve a good deal of inequality. If the substitutes are to be recruited in that congressional district itself—and that is the only way in which the Secretary of War can get at a fair distribution—then it precludes the possibility of procuring colored troops, such as have been suggested, because these districts in the northern States will not have within them the element from which to procure these substitutes.

Mr. CLARK. I think I understand fully the Senator from Missouri, and I say to him that the design of the amendment is that the Secretary of War shall procure his substitutes anywhere, and we trust to his discretion to assign them rightfully to the districts according to the time for which they are raised. There may be some inequality about the price paid, and so there is now in procuring substitutes. For instance, in my State I believe we obtain our men at about $500 apiece. I understand that in other States they pay $700 to get a substitute. This must be done under the discretion of somebody, and we trust the Secretary of War now, just as we have trusted him under the old act, to get the substitutes at the best possible price he can. We must have the men; and if he can get them for $50 or $100 or $200 apiece among the blacks, so much the better; so much do you relieve our own people. We get the men, and get good soldiers.

Mr. CONNESS. I am in favor of this amendment, but it occurred to me, on hearing it read, that it conflicted with some section previously adopted, and upon going to the desk I find that that is the case. I should like to have the eighteenth section read as it has been adopted. When that section is read, it will be noticed that it provides that certain persons described may commute for $900, which shall be paid and applied to a particular purpose, to wit, the care of sick and wounded soldiers. The section now proposed is general in its character, and provides that all the money which shall be paid as commutation shall be applied to the procurement of substitutes. I am in favor of the section now offered as it stands, and the amendment or change of the eighteenth section. One or the other will have to be changed so that both may be reconciled. I call for the reading of section eighteen as it has been adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.
The Secretary read, as follows:

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That members of religious denominations who shall by oath or affirmation declare that they are conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms, and who are prohibited from doing so by the rules and articles of faith and practice of said religious denomination, shall, when drafted into the military service, be considered non-combatants, and shall be assigned by the Secretary of War to duty in the hospitals, or to the care of freedmen, or shall pay the sum of $300 to such person as the Secretary of War shall designate to receive it, to be applied to the benefit of the sick and wounded soldiers; and such drafted persons shall then be exempt from draft during the time for which they shall have been drafted.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, Mr. President, there is a conflict between the two sections. Perhaps the Senator from New Hampshire is reconciling them. If he shall successfully do it, that will be the end of it. I would prefer to have this changed rather than his section, and to have his section remain as it is. It is clear you cannot pay the money in both places.

Mr. CLARK. I will add, "but this section shall not be construed to affect in any way the commutation money paid under section eighteen of this act." I am obliged to the Senator from California, because I did not think of that commutation money when I drew the amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire by inserting after the word "be" the words "procured in and;" so as to read, "which substitute shall be procured in and credited to that district." My purpose is simply to guard against an abuse that I think may follow this legislation. As I understand from the Senator from New Hampshire, the idea that he entertains is that it will be competent for the Secretary of War to receive, for example, from any district in Massachusetts or New Hampshire, or any other State where there is a deficiency under the draft, the $300 paid by drafted persons, and to go down into South Carolina or Louisiana, and there, with fifty dollars, procure substitutes for the deficiency in that congressional district. I am utterly unwilling to do that. While I am as anxious, and have been from the commencement of this war, as any man could be to call to the service of the United States colored troops, I insist upon it that they should be registered as troops belonging to the United States, for which the United States alone should be responsible, and which we as a Government should have a sole interest in, and not credit them to any particular State unless they are residents of the State. ["Why not?"] I will tell the Senators why not. Suppose there is a proposition introduced here by the Senator from Massachusetts to authorize the State of Massachusetts, a great and a rich State, to go down into Louisiana and South Carolina and there fill up their quota by enlisting colored men; there are some very insuperable objections to that, and they are these: in the first place, if you permit that to be done, then, instead of their being understood to be the troops of the United States, they are the mercenaries of the State of Massachusetts; and you will create a conflict among the States, among the soldiers of the different States, that will demoralize your armies. Suppose you let Massachusetts go down and with her munificent bounties recruit fifteen thousand men in General Banks's department, they are to be known as Massachusetts men, to be substitutes for Massachusetts men who were drafted or who ought to go into the service under the draft. In that department there are, perhaps, two or three regiments of Massachusetts soldiers, and at the same time there are twelve or fourteen regiments from my State. My State is too poor to send agents down there with large bounties in their pockets to enlist troops. How long do you suppose there would be a good military and moral sentiment existing between the soldiers from Massachusetts and the soldiers from Iowa if they were permitted to fill out their quota with colored men and we were required to fill our quota up by the best blood we have in our State? How long do you suppose General Banks would be able to maintain the position he maintains now in command of those troops? You would subject him all the time to the imputation of using influences or permitting influences to be used to fill up the quota from the State of which he is a citizen to the injury of the other States of this Union.

Again, if you allow this to be done, when the Massachusetts regiments and other regiments from the wealthy States go out of service their places will be filled by colored men and in the course of this war, if it shall be protracted, as it possibly may be, for two or three years, you will find that while some of the States will be fighting for the Union with white soldiers alone, there will be other States that will have nobody fighting for the Government except colored troops and a few white officers with them. If you expect that you are going to preserve the Union and to prevent local dissensions and jealousies by the establishment of any such rule as that, I think you will find that you are most egregiously mistaken.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I do not feel the force of this objection to the extent that the Senator from Iowa seems to do. This is not a proposition, by any means, to allow the State of Massachusetts to send its rich agents down to Louisiana to enlist colored troops, but it is a provision by which the Secretary of War can do exactly what he now does—take the money paid for commutation and procure substitutes. But it has this further provision, that they shall be credited to the district which pays the money. Now I do not understand that these troops are necessarily put among the troops of that district. If, for instance, one of the districts in my State has raised one regiment and is deficient half another regiment, I do not see why black troops may not be raised and put in another organization distinct entirely from that, and still credited to the district. It does not follow that they are to be mixed up.

But, sir, there is another reason why this may be done, and I think a reason which is felt by some of the States very strongly. It is felt in many parts of the country that the labor of the country to some extent is being exhausted, and some States and some sections of the country have felt that it is better for the Government, better for themselves in every regard, to keep their labor at home and employ it usefully, and to aid the Government in that way, and to procure men from other quarters to fight battles for the Government. To illustrate: my State has procured substitutes largely from foreigners to go into the Army. In that way they bring into your service the foreign aid, and also keep their own laborers at home to labor for the Government, and you get the benefit in some degree of both.

It seems to me very much better that by this provision we should allow the Government to take these black men and put them into the service of the country and make soldiers of them, than to keep them over here in Virginia, or other quarters, and feed them, when perhaps some of them are not in the service, though I am happy to learn that they earn their living by their labor; but I think we can make them still more useful in this way, and relieve the country to that extent of a burden.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I agree with the honorable Senator as to the necessity and propriety of calling these colored men into the service of the United States. I have been for that from the commencement of this war. No man has been ahead of me in that particular; but I want them called into the service of the United States as United States troops, and not as the substitutes for white soldiers from any State. That is the difference between the Senator and me. I would do anything in my power to stimulate the recruitment of colored troops. I believe it is the most important thing, and more important than the passage of this bill, if we can devise some scheme by which we can stimulate the Administration to that course; but I am utterly opposed to the selection of these colored men as the representatives of the citizens of any State, I do not care whether it be mine or any other State, that has not filled up its quota. I know very well that it will be greatly to the advantage of particular States, of all the States indeed, to save their labor at home and to send colored men abroad to fight for them. I would like to have the same thing for my own State. I would like to have colored men take the place of the white soldiers who have gone from my State and who are constantly going from it; but I cannot do that with any fair show of equality among the several States, upon the plan that is suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire. Let the colored men be enlisted for the Government, paid by the Government, let the entire Government be responsible for them and interested in them, and not let them, unless they be the residents of that State, go into the service as the representatives of any particular State.

Mr. CLARK. I do not desire to delay the action of the Senate, but perhaps I ought to state, as the Senator from Iowa has said that this may be for the benefit of some States, that it is not by any means for the benefit of mine, if he desired to aim that remark at me. My State will procure its quota under the call for volunteers without any draft, and she will procure white men, men in her own section, and put them into the armies of the country to fight for her. Nor does it follow that if we adopt this provision, the Secretary of War will necessarily get black men. He may or he may not. He may get white men. He may fill up, as he undoubtedly will, the residue of a regiment in any section in many cases, if not all, with white men. It does not confine him to one or the other, but there is a propriety, if with the money of a district the substitute is procured, that that substitute, be he black or white, should be credited to the district which pays the money.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the argument of the honorable Senator from Iowa is founded on a possibility. He thinks this amendment should not prevail because by possibility certain colored men may be procured to fill up the quotas of the States. Now, sir, the probability of it, in the first place, is not very strong; but what harm in it? Follow out the Senator's argument: he says, and says justly, that nobody has been more anxious than he has been to enlist colored troops, and to enlist a great many of them. For what purpose? Is it not to relieve the different States, if you please, or to relieve the country of the necessity of furnishing white men?

Mr. GRIMES. To relieve the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well, to relieve the country; that is the object. Now, the Senator does not expect that we shall get three hundred thousand, four hundred thousand, or five hundred thousand colored troops, and then keep in the field all the white men that we should have without them.

Mr. GRIMES. But I think this: that if we discharge the white troops we ought to be permitted to discharge our proportion of the white troops according as the State of Maine discharges her proportion, which would not be the case under this provision.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator's argument, he will permit me to say, is a very narrow one. It is founded in the first place on an assumption, which assumption it will do to talk about in the Senate but will not do so well to talk about out of the Senate. He assumes that certain States of the Union have more money than certain other States in the Union, and he follows it up by assuming that they will pay more money. He first assumes that they have more money, and then that they will pay it, and therefore that injustice will be done.

Now, what does he desire? Does he desire that any State in the Union should pay its money and at the same time furnish its men? If it is more for its interest, it is more for the interest of the whole country that a certain part of its population should remain at home; and if you get the soldiers, have you not accomplished your purpose? Does it make any difference where he comes from? Are you so very anxious because ten thousand men go from Iowa, and it is their interest to go, that therefore ten thousand men should go from another State where it is not so much for their interest that they should? If the other State furnishes the men, what difference does it make to Iowa where they come from? That is the question I want answered.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. GRIMES. Would the Senator esteem it fair to permit the State of Iowa to go down into the State of Maine and there recruit to fill up its quota?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to it if you offer more money than we do.

Mr. GRIMES. Do you permit it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that there is any objection to it, and I have never heard of any law prohibiting it.

Mr. GRIMES. All of the States, I believe, exclude other States from going within their jurisdiction to recruit. I know that agents for that purpose have been warned out of almost all the States. But here is a fountain, if you please, that is owned by the whole nation. We are as much interested in it as the State of Maine. We want to prevent a second draft upon my State, and we think we shall be able to avoid a second draft if we stimulate the enlistment of colored men. But the Senator from Maine and the Senator from New Hampshire propose to exhaust that source from which we expect hereafter to draw recruits to prevent another draft in our State, by applying these men to fill up the quota of particular States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now the Senator is assuming another thing, and that is that the States recruit. The States do not do any such thing. This money is paid into the hands of the War Department to get substitutes. The Secretary may get them as he pleases and where he pleases. The States do not send recruiting officers into other States or among colored men to get them. They are not subject to State regulations, and do not necessarily go into State regiments wherever they come from. The fact is, it amounts to this, and nothing more: it enables the Secretary to obtain his men somewhere.

As I said before, the Senator's reasoning is narrow. What does he desire? He assumes, and I take him on his assumption, because he has repeated it here, that the money raised by taxation to very much the largest extent comes from certain States in this Union. He wants it so to come; and then he wishes that money to be applied to paying the expenses for the whole country. Very well; it is so. What further does he ask? He asks that certain individuals may furnish the commutation money in a particular State, and that that money shall be applied, in fact, to the benefit of Iowa. That is the amount of his argument—that not only what is got by taxation in the first place, but what is paid out specifically to relieve a particular State, shall go to the benefit of Iowa.

Now, sir, I believe that it is hardly useful to talk about this relief of the States, and to get up a question of that description. The Senator knows very well that the State he represents is filled with young men who are emigrants from the old States, and consequently it is very much easier to obtain men there, because there are more of the class that can, without the sacrifice of their interests, volunteer, or go if they are drafted—unmarried men. That is not so in the old States. The proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire does not vary the old law except to make it more stringent on the old States. As the law now stands, the Secretary takes the money, obtains the substitutes, and credits them to the States paying the money, whether he has to pay more than the $300 or not. That is the present condition of the law; because for every $300 paid a man is marked to the credit of the State. The proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire goes further. It says, that shall not be so; the man shall not be credited to the State unless he is procured, no matter how much money it may take. It may take $600 or $1,000, but still the State cannot have the credit of it until the substitute is actually procured. The effect, therefore, of the proposition made by the Senator from New Hampshire is, in fact, to extend the law further than it was before in that particular. The Senator from Iowa now desires, where it may be difficult in a State to procure the men, owing to its peculiar position, that the Secretary of War shall be precluded from getting them anywhere else, and the State shall not be credited for them until they are raised precisely out of that particular place. The result would be to nullify in fact the effect of the whole provision, so far as any benefit is to be derived from it.

Mr. GRIMES. As I understand it, Mr. President, I am contending precisely for what the Senator said yesterday was the law; that is, that this was a personal privilege belonging to the individual who is drafted, that he may buy off his individual freedom by paying $300, but that the State in which he was drafted was still liable for the man who became the substitute. Now I propose to carry out that idea which the Senator held was the law yesterday, and which he agreed this morning should continue to be the law.

It is very true that my State has but little interest in this present draft. We have greatly exceeded, so far as I can learn, the demands upon us, and probably very nearly come up to filling the second quota that may be called for; but I am contending for a principle that I believe to be abstractly right. It is very easy to talk about the States not being interested in this thing; but we all know that these recruitments have been made by the States. We all know that the States and the congressional districts and the sub-districts have had agents in the field filling up these quotas, and that it at last becomes a question between the several States as to the manner in which they will fill up their quotas and the means to which they will resort to accomplish that purpose. I can only reiterate what I said before, that it seems to me manifestly unjust to permit a State or the representatives of a congressional district, or, in other words, to permit the agent of a State, the Secretary of War, (for he stands in no other attitude than that, as the agent of a State or a congressional district under the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire,) to go down to South Carolina or Alabama and there recruit negroes out of that common fund which belongs to my State as well as to the State that is in default. Do not Senators see that if they want to avoid a second draft they must reserve this body of colored men for United States soldiers and not to be the soldiers of any particular State or of any particular congressional district? If, after this draft shall be completed, we can only stimulate the War Department to put one hundred thousand colored men in the field, which they ought to have done long ago, there will then be no necessity for a draft. But you take away from the Secretary of War the means of doing that by allowing him to go down, as the agent of a congressional district that is in default, and recruit those very men that should be applied to the other States equally with that defaulting State upon its second draft.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator amounts to just this, to put it into a very few words: certain States in the Union have got more money than others; they shall not have the benefit of it at all; we will not allow them; we do not like it; we do not choose to appropriate what we have got in that way, and nobody else shall. That is just exactly the length, breadth, and thickness of it: if you want to furnish the money and hire men, you shall not do it, but you must send your men into the field, however much it may be against your interest. What I contended for originally was this, that the State should make up its quota. I said, in the view of the law as I had it yesterday, it must be made up by drafting unless they chose to volunteer or to furnish volunteers in another way. The object of this amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire is precisely this: to compel them to make it up, and it says the money shall not be credited unless it is sufficient to get the men; each man obtained shall be credited, no matter how much he costs, but the money shall not be credited unless it obtains a man. That is the object of the Senator's amendment, and it will produce that effect.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the argument of the Senator from Maine would be conclusive if men all cost the same price; but I understand that in New England a man fit to be a soldier costs now about $600. If you will allow a drafted man to pay out $300 and permit the Government to buy colored men with the money, as is being done in Maryland and Missouri, I understand, where they can be procured for $300, the argument, as it seems to me, is less conclusive. We raise white men that are worth $600 apiece—they cost that in New England—and put them into the service, and then we allow New England to buy men who can be bought for $300 as substitutes in those States. Here is the inequality that exists, as it seems to me. I am not willing that colored men, who can be procured for much less than $600, shall be credited to a State the same as white men, who cost much more.

I agree perfectly with my colleague that if these men are employed in Tennessee, South Carolina, North Carolina, or Louisiana, they shall be employed by the Federal Government, and their service as soldiers shall be for the common good, and not for the good of the States that can pay $300 for the drafted men more readily than they can furnish the men. This, in other words, should be a tax on the able-bodied men of the Republic. You want able-bodied men to serve the Republic in the field. This levy ought to be made on the States equitably. They should be called upon in proportion to the number of able-bodied men in the State. If you permit men who are drafted to evade this tax levied on men for the purpose of procuring muscle and intellect to serve the Republic in its armies, you should not relieve the State or the residue of the people of the State from the performance of their quota of service. If it were a tax levied on the country for money to pay the men, then, I suppose, these wealthy men in the States that have been alluded to will be compelled to pay in proportion to their incomes; and this will be right. This tax is not a tax levied on the money of the country, but a tax levied on the men of the nation. I can never agree that Massachusetts, or Maine, or New England, or Iowa, shall be permitted to fill its quota of drafted men from the men of Louisiana. Louisiana is a State, as it is maintained, of the Republic. The people in that State owe service to the Government as fully as the people of Maine or Iowa, and if men can be procured there by the agency of the Federal Government, they ought to be appropriated to the country at large, and not to any individual State.

I think, therefore, the argument of the Senator from Maine is not conclusive. Men do not all cost the same amount of money. Colored men can serve in the armies of the Republic in certain capacities. They may labor as well in the ditches and on the fortifications, but nobody need pretend that they are, on an average, worth as much as white men. It never has been so, and never will be so, that men of less cultivation are worth as much as those who are cultivated, in the armies. Intellect has something to do with the courage of men, with their persistence; and an ignorant community never did furnish as good soldiers as those that are cultivated. It never has been so, and never will be so. An enlightened nation always furnishes the best armies. While I have believed from the beginning that colored men ought to be employed, and may be employed with great effect, I never did believe they would be equal to the white men of the Republic, even as soldiers. They may have, and do have, I think, an equal amount of brute force; they can perform an equal amount of physical labor; but they are not worth as much; and I think the result of the service of our own arms in the field will show that they cannot be trusted to some extent. They may serve in connection with white troops, but we cannot rely on them exclusively.

While I am on my feet, I might as well say that I think the bill as it now stands is wrong in this: the commutation is not enough. You propose to allow a man to buy himself off for $400, while a man in the market, if I may use such a term, costs $600. There is no recruiting station, I believe, in the free States anywhere where volunteers can be procured for $400 each. There are other inducements held out besides the $300 or $400 offered by the Government. In my own State, I think in all the counties of the State, at every recruiting station, either the county or the town or the township has added to the Government bounty, and has agreed, in addition, to provide for the welfare of the families of the men that volunteer for the purpose of avoiding a draft. There is perhaps a neighborhood pride, a town pride, a county pride brought to bear, which weighs something in the settlement of this question; and then the county, town, or township adds money and agrees to provide for the welfare of his family in the absence of the soldier in the field. It has been stated here repeatedly that in New England some of the States give a bounty of $300 in addition to the Government bounty. Then, I have been told, the towns and cities add an additional sum to this State bounty, and thus run up the price of substitutes. Then we as a nation agree to allow a man who is drafted, whose services are needed in the field, to buy himself off for $300 or $400, and then the Government turns around and pays an equal sum of money, and the States individually add to that sum, for a substitute, who thus costs the Government double the amount that enables the party to buy himself off from the performance of this service due to the Republic.

It seems to me the correct rule ought to be to compel the man to go or to pay enough money to hire another man equal to himself. I can never agree that he may be permitted to release himself from this service by paying money enough to hire an inferior man. I do not think colored soldiers will ever be equal to the white troops, and hence I am unwilling to agree to the proposition advocated by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was not my proposition at all. The simple truth of the matter is that the Senator's colleague got up this scarecrow, the possibility that colored men might be obtained and that this amendment might operate in that way. The proposition is simply that the Secretary of War shall procure the substitutes. The probability is that he would procure them in just those States where there is a deficiency; but the Senator from Iowa imagines that possibly he may go down South and get colored men; and on that he predicated his argument, and on that his colleague follows him.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, the Senator who raised the "scarecrow" is the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] who stated that this might be the course which the Secretary of War would pursue; and it was on that hypothesis that I based what I had to say, because I wanted to avoid even the possibility, and he said the Secretary would probably do it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a question between the Senator and the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GRIMES. It is a question that occurred in the presence of the Senator; and I do not choose that the Senator shall say that I introduced the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know how that may be. I did not raise the argument; nor did I imagine that the argument would arise to any considerable extent. Nobody imagines that it would, except the Senators from Iowa, who really seem to be alarmed for fear that somebody may be relieved—that seems to be their great trouble—of a burden to some possible extent, and therefore the great State of Iowa may suffer. That is the whole logic and benevolence of the argument from the beginning to the end. The Senator says a substitute in New England costs $600, and shall we permit them to be employed elsewhere for $300? That would be an outrage on the State of Iowa. In other words, if the nature of our labor is such as to make it necessary or convenient, or for our interest, that a man should be procured possibly elsewhere for a less sum than we are now obliged to pay, we shall not have the benefit of it, because we thereby relieve ourselves of serving under the draft; whereas in the State of Iowa there is no necessity for such a thing. The Senators have stated here that in Iowa they paid no bounties; the State pays none, the county pays none.

Mr. HARLAN. I know the Senator does not intend to misrepresent my State. I have just stated that they do pay a bounty in excess of the Government bounty, I think at every recruiting station in the State; and in addition, they provide for the welfare of the families by making monthly payments to the wives of those who volunteer and go into the service.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can only say that the Senator and his colleague do not agree in their ideas of what is the state of the case in Iowa. The State, I see in some statement with regard to it, has incurred no debt.

Mr. HARLAN. The State as a State does not; but counties and towns and neighborhoods do.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I am corrected. I had my information from the Senator's colleague that there were no bounties whatever paid in the State of Iowa; that all there was there was a provision for the families of soldiers. We make the same provision for the families precisely, and we pay the bounties besides, cost what they may. That is the simple truth of it. The labor in some places is so needed at home and is of such a nature that it is essential that the money should be paid and substitutes obtained. Now, here is a bare possibility presented—because after all it is but a possibility—that by this proposition the men, to a certain extent, might possibly be secured by the Secretary of War for a less sum by procuring them somewhere else perhaps. That idea seems to afflict my friends, who think that it is not fair as between us and others. If that argument is one that addresses itself to the Senate, I cannot help it.

Mr. CONNESS. If I thought this amendment would be construed as the Senator from Iowa seems to fear, I should vote against it; but I have not the slightest fear that the War Department will so construe it. On the contrary, I know that the War Department is determined to enroll and enlist and muster into the service of the United States colored men as United States soldiers, and that it is totally opposed to allowing the agents of States to go down into the southern States and make commerce of those men by grabbing among them and putting into the States' quota relatively as many as shall be necessary to make it up.

Mr. HARLAN. I will inquire of the Senator from California if he does not know that Massachusetts has mustered in regiments of colored men heretofore, and been credited for the number thus mustered in, procured beyond the limits of Massachusetts; some of them in South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, and St. Louis.

Mr. CONNESS. I know that that has been done; but I also understand it to have been put a stop to; and I understand that the Department, acting upon its discretion, will no longer permit such a thing to be done.

I know that that evil went further, and I will say to the Senator from Iowa that Massachusetts has about four hundred of the citizens of California in its service as a part of its quota. I have complaints from those men daily since they have been in the service. They are not satisfied, and they never will be satisfied, because they find themselves working in the field and the result of their prowess and efficiency as soldiers credited to another State than their own. They enlisted among the troops of Massachusetts in order to obtain active service and to serve the country, owing to the distance of their own State from the great theater of the war; but they are dissatisfied; and so it will always turn out in such cases.

I am utterly and entirely opposed, as I know the War Department now is, to allowing this thing to be done; but I am entirely satisfied that this amendment, if adopted, will not be so construed by the Department, while it will serve the other purpose, which I think very essential, of supplying a want of the old law as pointed out clearly to us by the Senator from Maine this morning; and therefore I am in favor of it.

Mr. CLARK. I desire for a moment to call the attention of Senators to what is the law. A party drafted may pay his $300 or $400 commutation money, and that commutation money the Secretary of War is required to expend in procuring substitutes. Is there any limit on him at the present time that he must get the substitute in the district? Not at all. He may expend that money now anywhere, wherever he pleases, and he credits the State, not with the amount of men obtained, but counting each $300 as a man, whether he gets the man or not. This amendment provides that he shall only credit the amount of men he actually obtains. It alters the law no further in that respect.

Mr. DAVIS. I think, sir, the loyal States ought to be restricted in making up their proportion of soldiers to their own limits; at least they should not be permitted to go into the limits of other loyal States, whether the agencies by which troops are to be drawn from them be State or Federal. I admit that it is very desirable to the New England States to keep their laboring population at home and not permit them if they can avoid it to go into the Army. For what reason? The most skillful, available, and valuable labor on earth is the labor of the New England mechanics. In point of result, both in the achievement of manufactured articles and in creating wealth, there is no labor in the world that compares with that of New England; consequently, considerations of political economy would make it very desirable to the leading minds of New England to make every arrangement practicable to keep her laborers at home.

How is it with other loyal States, especially the border slave States? A large proportion of their labor is negro labor, unskillful, not productive at all in comparison with the skillful, cultivated labor of the northern States. Here is the way it is going to operate and does operate: the border slave States may furnish their quota of volunteers or of drafted men, and yet, under the operation of the law that allows the Secretary of War to go into other States and recruit negro soldiers, although my State may furnish by volunteering or by drafting its full quota, it would not at all exempt its negro laborers from being recruited and taken into the Army. How is it in Maryland and in Missouri and in Tennessee at this time? The Secretary of War would sooner enlist a slave in those States than a white man. His object and his policy, and that of the President, is to break up the institution, to demoralize it, to withdraw from the fields and other theaters of labor in the border slave States their entire effective male slave population, and to leave the remnant of that race, old men, women, and children, and in that way to make the institution of slavery a burden upon the owners, and thus to make it repulsive to them by leaving only the non-effectives to be supported by them, and in that way to wring their consent to emancipation, of themselves, or its abolition by the usurped power of the President.

Mr. President, it is complained that Kentucky is not a recruiting ground for the enlistment of negroes. That was professedly the state of case, but it is not and has not been the fact for some time. Indeed, I am informed that within a few days recruiting of negroes has been ordered in that State. The Secretary of War has sent special agents to recruit negroes in the lower or first district of Kentucky. But for some considerable time this has been in practical operation: they have established recruiting stations within the borders of Tennessee, along the southern Kentucky line, and they allure and receive all slaves escaping from their masters in the State of Kentucky. They send over emissaries from those camps and inveigle men, women, and children. On the application of a member of Congress from that State, and of other citizens who are interested in this property—although they are as loyal to the United States and its Government as any men whatever—they denied to them wholly the privilege of reclaiming any of their slaves.

Mr. President, I do not make these remarks with the expectation that they will have the least influence upon gentlemen to correct the wrong of which I complain; but I make them for the purpose of presenting the state of fact to the country. Here is the State of Kentucky, that has I suppose sent twenty thousand of her sons, her unworthy and traitorous sons, into the southern army, and she has sent upwards of fifty thousand of those who are loyal and true into the Union Army. If she were to be consulted she would prefer to make up her quota of troops entirely from the white population, and she would sooner furnish five white soldiers than that one negro soldier should be recruited in the State, because the effect of the recruitment of negro soldiers is to demoralize the whole of her slave population. She may fill up her full quota, every man, by volunteering or by drafting from the white population, and then, for the purpose of carrying out indirectly and furtively the policy of the Government, the Secretary of War sends his agents to establish recruiting stations along the Kentucky border within Tennessee, and they allure all the slaves from the State that they can induce to go to them, and still protest that they are not recruiting in the State of Kentucky.

Now, sir, here is the injustice of the operation: the northern States, that have a manufacturing population that constitutes their true wealth and true glory, and so large a part of the common glory and wealth of our country, are desirous to save to themselves this valuable population. It is a reasonable desire; but here is our inferior laboring population in the border States, consisting of negroes, that are abstracted from their owners and from the State, though the State may make up its full quota of white soldiers, for the purpose of taking the place of these northern operatives and of enabling those States to keep their laboring population at home. After our white freemen perform their full duty by mustering in the force that is required from the State to march to the battle-field, the negro laborers, who ought to be left there for the purpose of raising the necessities of life to support their white owners who have gone to the battle-field, are also taken into camp, and their owners left destitute of labor. In that way the border slave States are deprived of their necessary laboring population for the purpose of keeping at home the laboring population of other and distant sections.

Sir, the system is unjust and unequal in its operations. It has had a most deleterious effect in Maryland, and it is producing the same consequences in my own State and the State of Missouri. But no matter how unjust and oppressive it may operate upon the people of these loyal States, that will have no influence, I know, upon the Secretary of War or the President. On the contrary, so far as they can magnify these unjust fruits of their unconstitutional and illegal policy, they will do it by expanding them and aggravating them in every way they can. This war policy is more against slavery than the rebellion, and in waging it they are reckless whether they strike the loyal or disloyal. I merely make these remarks for the purpose of showing the state of the fact, and for no other purpose whatever.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to make a very short answer to the Senator from Kentucky, and it is this: heretofore, for over eighty years, the blacks in the slave States have been voters and not fighters; that is to say, their white masters have voted for them. We propose in this hour of the country's need and in the advanced stage of civilization, as we believe, to change the policy a little, so that hereafter, I trust, they will vote less and fight more. I am in favor of that policy.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the honorable Senator from California by whose arrangement and whose law was it that the black population voted through their white masters? Who ordered that? It was the framers of the Constitution. If they had not made that arrangement there would have been no Constitution, there would have been no Union. If that is a grievance, and operates unjustly on the white man of the free States, there is a mode of remedying it, and that mode is provided by the Constitution itself in its amendment. That feature in the Constitution, as well as any other, may be changed according to the mode prescribed by the instrument itself, through the medium of a national convention. I protest against the Secretary of War, or the President, or any other power producing the results upon this or any other subject connected with constitutional law which can be effected properly and legitimately only by a national convention.

Mr. CONNESS. So far as changing the voting part of the proposition is concerned, I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that it ought to be done, when done, by constitutional amendment; but I think that by the statute as we are now providing, and by the necessities of the nation, we can apply the remedy in the other direction, that of making them fighters.

Mr. HARLAN. I have a question to ask of the Senator from Kentucky, and that is, whether the Secretary of War has sent recruiting officers to Kentucky to recruit colored men after the quota of Kentucky has been filled?

Mr. DAVIS. I do not suppose he has. I do not suppose the quota is full there; but they are taking steps to fill it. I have no doubt it would be filled; that if Kentucky had the option to raise her quota of white recruits or submit to negro recruitment, she would accept and execute the first alternative.

Mr. HARLAN. I understand that the opportunity was given to the people of all the States until the 5th of January to fill up their quota of the three hundred thousand men. Some of the States have filled their quotas; some have not; and we now learn that Kentucky is of the latter class. The Secretary of War, according to his showing, has sent recruiting officers to Kentucky with authority to receive colored men. The white men have had the opportunity to volunteer and fill up the quota. They have not done so. The privilege is now to be extended to the colored men; and if they should be more patriotic than the white men, and come to the help of the country, I do not, as a Senator, feel inclined to complain. Nor do I see any injustice, in the levying of the blacks, in including the colored men of Kentucky or any other State. I do not think, as I have said a few minutes since, that they will make as good soldiers as white men, but they will be better than no soldiers at all. If the white men of Kentucky would volunteer in sufficient numbers to fill up her quota I suppose no effort would be made to enlist her colored population; that is, no draft would be executed. But why should not a colored man serve in the armies of the Republic in the absence of a disposition or willingness on the part of the white population of the State to do so? It cannot grow out of the fact that the colored man is supposed to owe service to the white man, because many of the white men of Kentucky, I doubt not, owe service to other men. All those under twenty-one years of age doubtless do so; but those who are over twenty and under twenty-one years of age are subject to the operation of the draft. In the execution of this law the Government does not consult the father of the young man who may be a minor over twenty years of age, but his name is enrolled, and if, when the lot is cast, it should be selected, he is compelled to serve, as much so as if he were twenty-one or thirty years old. On what principle can you exempt a man who owes service during life to another from serving in the armies of the Republic when you do not exempt the son who is still a minor? You compel the father to give up his son, the offspring of his own loins, although he owes him service for another year. You do not consult his will or wishes. Is the relation of master and slave stronger than the relation of father and son?

It seems to me the complaint ought to be from the other quarter, that while these able-bodied colored men are exempt the minor sons of white men are compelled to serve. As it seems to me, justice to the white people of Kentucky, and the white people of the whole country requires that all the able-bodied men of the Republic embraced within the age indicated in the law should be subject to the draft. If the people of the States volunteer and fill their quota of course they are released. If they do not do so, then it seems to me that justice to the white people of Kentucky, as well as the people of the whole Republic, requires that the draft should be executed impartially on all. If colored men are selected, it releases that number of white men who may be citizens of Kentucky. On principle I can see no reason for the exemption of the colored men of Kentucky or of any other State; but if the white men would volunteer, as I believe they would make better soldiers, of course I would not be in favor of compelling the colored men to serve.

Mr. DAVIS. One word in reply to my friend from Iowa. I believe that but two or three States have filled up their full quota as yet by volunteering. Another, New Hampshire, has nearly completed hers.

Mr. ANTHONY. Ours was completed long ago, and half of another quota.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not recollect whether yours was one of the few in my computation or not. Then there are some three or four States that have completed their quota. According to my information, the State of Kentucky a month or two ago had come within about three thousand men of completing her quota. I do not know how the fact is. Now, if Kentucky was in default and the proposition was to make up the defalcation of white men by enlisting negroes in that State, there might be a show of reason and justice in it; but this is the point of view in which I complain of it strongly: that no matter whether Kentucky has filled up her quota or not, even though she may fill it, the Secretary of War goes on to recruit from our laborers, and to deprive the owners and the State of the benefit of their labor.

Now, sir, we of the present generation did not select our class of laborers. If we had the free option to have laborers all white or partly white and partly black there is not one man in a score in the State of Kentucky but would have them all white. We are not attached to but are opposed to slavery as an institution in the abstract if we could change it even as a matter of public or political economy. It is a most expensive sort of labor. I know, myself, that such is the fact. But we have that labor upon us to the extent of two hundred and fifty thousand people. It was imposed upon us by former generations. The present people of the State have no option, no choice, in relation to the subject at all. They are either to continue those laborers or they are to turn them free among themselves. If they could liberate them and colonize them to-morrow, next week, or next year, it would be done by the voice of the people of that State; but they cannot do it. The evil is upon us. It is beyond our control or correction. But the point of view in which I complain is this: that when we are about to fill our requisition of soldiers, and when we are but a few thousand in default, the Secretary of War comes into our State and recruits from among the laborers our loyal people without regard to the fact whether we have filled or are about to fill our quota or not.

Various gentlemen here have stated how Massachusetts has been sweeping over the whole land, from New York to Hilton Head and New Orleans, for the purpose of recruiting her quota from negroes. I do not censure her for it; that is, I do not say it is unnatural for her to make such efforts to substitute in the military service the labor of other States for her valuable and skillful mechanical labor. But I complain that she should be allowed by the military authorities to shelter and to keep her laborers at home by a system that unlawfully and oppressively takes from other States their labor and tends to the impoverishment of their people.

Mr. CONNESS. I agree to that proposition.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course the just and fair-minded Senator from California agrees to that proposition. It seems to me it ought to strike the sense of justice of every man so as to receive his assent. I should be glad to offer a proposition to restrict the recruiting of negroes under the law or under the practice of the Department in any State to the number sufficient to make up the quota of that State; but I do not offer it, because I know it would avail nothing, and that even if it passed this body it could be defeated by the subterfuges of executive administration. I therefore abstain from the futile task of attempting a modification of the law or of the practice of the Department in relation to this matter.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question. The Senator from Kentucky was not very plainly heard on this side of the Chamber, but I understood him to say that the people of Kentucky would send five white men to the war rather than one negro.

Mr. WILSON. I had hoped that we should have a vote on the bill before this time; and I do not rise for the purpose of continuing but for a moment this debate.

Allusion has been made by several Senators to the action of my State in raising colored troops. I will say that we in Massachusetts have a profound conviction that the whole cause of this war is slavery, nothing else; and we were early of the opinion that we ought to employ colored men to help to fight the battles of the country. We raised two regiments. A portion of them resided in our own State, and colored men belonging to other parts of the country where they were not raising colored troops came into those regiments. We have put those regiments in the field where they are doing their duty, and doing it faithfully. We are now raising a regiment of mounted men in our State; and if any colored man chooses to go into that State and take the bounty the State offers, he will be taken. I do not see any objection to that.

Then, again, some time last year some Massachusetts men in California addressed the Governor of our State and asked to be mustered into the service. I think there were four or five companies of them. I do not know that they were all formerly from Massachusetts, but a large number of them were, and Massachusetts men had the lead of it. They came to that State, organized into companies, and now make up a part of the second Massachusetts cavalry, and are doing duty in the field, and doing it faithfully as we all know, under one of the most accomplished officers of the Army. I mean Colonel Lowell, a captain in the regular cavalry. I suppose all the men in the service would like to be spoken of as coming from the State in which they reside, and possibly these men would rather belong to a California regiment than to be a part of a Massachusetts regiment.

Now, sir, it is said here to-day that the Secretary of War has been raising colored men in the southern States. What some of us complain of—and I understand the Senator from Iowa to make that complaint—is, that the Government has not done enough of that. I am of that opinion. I know that in the State of Maryland an appeal was made to the people of that State whether they would have colored men enlisted into the service or go themselves under a draft, and it was one of the most powerful elements in the last election in the State of Maryland. I think the gentleman who represents the Eastern Shore of Maryland was elected on that issue, that the laboring men of Maryland preferred that the blacks, slave and free, should go into the service rather than be drafted themselves.

I believe that if you put that issue to the poor white men of the State of Kentucky to-day they will vote five to one to have the slaves, especially of rebel masters, go into the service of the country and allow them to remain at home. I have complained for the last four months, and I have addressed my complaints to the President and the Secretary of War over and over again, that the Government did not comply with the wishes of some of the ablest and noblest men of Kentucky and enlist the slaves of rebels to fight the battles of the Republic. Many of the ablest men of that State have been pressing that subject for four or five months upon the Government. I understand the Government is now about doing that very thing, and I rejoice at it. I would not ask Kentucky or any other slave State to send more than her quota in the field, including white men and colored men, free and slave, in the enrollment. The Government has construed the act to mean that it only includes colored free men, and not slaves, in the enrollment. In the States of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, West Virginia, and Missouri, the slaves are not enrolled and do not go to make up a part of their quota. This whole class is left out of the enrollment. Why should they be omitted? There is no reason on earth for it. They ought to be enrolled; they ought to go into the quota of the State, and the Government ought to enlist them whenever it can, just as it enlists other men throughout the country.

But, sir, as to this proposition, I am willing that it should be adopted. I do not see the necessity of it. I regretted the introduction of this whole matter; but in the form in which the Senator from New Hampshire has put the amendment, I shall not object to its adoption.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, as the Senator from Massachusetts has referred to the State of Maryland, I rise merely for the purpose of stating what I believe to be the fact. Whether the war itself was caused by the institution of slavery, either partially or wholly, it is not my purpose now to inquire. A great deal might be said on both sides of that question. That slavery may have caused it, may be true; but that slavery of itself was not the cause of it, may be equally true. Whether there were other causes than the existence of that institution which have led us into our present situation, is a subject with which, as I have said, I do not mean now to deal. The war is upon us, and no matter what may have been its origin, it is our clear duty by all the means in the power of the Government to bring it to a successful termination, and I hope and I believe that it will be brought to such a termination if we are in our councils here and in the other branch of Congress unanimous upon that subject, and conscientious in discharging, to the best of our ability, the duty which that opinion may impose.

The Senator from Massachusetts has said, what no doubt he believes, that the elections in Maryland during the last canvass resulted as they did result principally from the fact that the Government were enlisting slaves as soldiers in the Army of the United States. It is true that a good many of the people of Maryland were then of opinion, and are now of opinion, that it is desirable that black men should be enlisted, because by their enlistment they save from the obligation to go into the military service of the United States the same number of white men. It is but reasonable to suppose, therefore, that to a certain extent that had some influence on the election. But it is equally true, as I think, that a large majority of the people upon the Eastern Shore of Maryland, which was the locality particularly suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, were very much opposed to the conduct of the Government in that respect. They were opposed to it, first, because they thought, many of them, and I have no doubt they were very sincere in that belief, that the Government had no authority at all to call them into the service; and they were opposed to it because they believed, as I understand the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] to believe, that they will make very inefficient soldiers as compared with white men. In that belief I certainly, to a considerable extent, share. That they can become good soldiers after being trained for one or two years, I believe is true; but that they will be equal in the field in a shorter time than that to do the duty which a white man can do in the same condition, I do not believe.

But the election in Maryland, Mr. President, as I think, with due deference to the information upon which the Senator from Massachusetts has thought proper to make his statement, resulted as it did result upon the Eastern Shore of Maryland almost exclusively from another cause, from the interference of the military, not only, in my judgment, an interference without authority, but an interference against all the authority, national and State. That interference consisted, as perhaps the Senate may not be as fully aware as I am, not only in the determination upon the part of the military to secure to all the voters of the State the privilege of voting at that election, but it was used for the purpose of saying who should enjoy it. They disregarded all the laws of Maryland; they disregarded the organic law of Maryland; they usurped the authority, whatever it may have been, of the Constitution of the United States, conferred upon the military or the head of the military. In the first place, they determined that no man should vote unless he took the oath proscribed by the military commander. By the order which was originally issued, although subsequently, the day preceding the election, altered in one respect, but still, in my judgment, leaving it very objectionable, they were ordered to arrest any man hanging about the polls, any man at the polls, any man approaching the polls, whom they thought was not loyal. And they were ordered also to report to the head of the military, the general who was then in command of that military department, the judges of the election who should refuse to administer the prescribed oath, the inference from which, as drawn by the judges, the only inference which they could have drawn, of course, was, that in the event of such a refusal upon their part becoming known to the head of the military they were to be arrested. In the execution of these several orders, men were arrested miles from the polls; at the polls judges of election were arrested upon the ground of their supposed disloyalty. Some of the parties arrested were brought to the city of Baltimore the evening before the election—some seven or eight of them—consisting, as I know personally, in part of gentlemen of as stern and fixed loyalty as are to be found in any State in the Union, but who had become obnoxious, not because they were opposed to the abolition of slavery in Maryland, prospectively, gradually, but because they were opposed to instantaneous emancipation without compensation. If an opinion of that description constitutes disloyalty, they were disloyal; but I am sure there is no member of the Senate who will say that that is any evidence at all, much less conclusive evidence, that the party who entertains it is disloyal to the Government. They were brought to the city of Baltimore, and some of them thrown into a prison which had been used, to the disgrace of the city, as a prison for the safe-keeping of slaves while the domestic slave trade was being carried on, and were not discharged until the next day. Some of them, the moment it became known to the proper department, whether to the commander or his subordinates I do not know, were told that it was an outrage not warranted by the orders of the commander—done upon the authority of the subordinate who was in command at the particular polls where the arrests were made, and that they should be returned at once. A steamer was chartered; they were put on board on Monday night, arrived at Chestertown, the district where the particular outrage had been committed, bearing with them a letter to the commander who had ordered the arrest, marked "official," they being told when they were sent home that they were all discharged; and the commander to whom the letter was addressed not being there, but having gone off to some other district for the purpose of repeating the same outrage, the officer second in command opened the official letter, as he thought he had a right to do, and there fell out of it a private letter, written by one of the staff of the commander of the department, to the officer who had committed the outrage, telling him to discharge two, but to keep all the rest in prison until the election was over.

I do not think I am mistaken when I say to my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, and to other Senators, that if that proceeding had not been resorted to, the gentleman who was elected from that Shore to the other House would not occupy the post which he now holds. I say that not from any personal or political dislike to that gentleman. A worthier, a truer man is not to be found within the limits of our State, or any other; he is a man of great ability, and a pure patriot, but he owes the seat which he now honors (because he is abundantly able to fill it) not to the choice of the people of the district, their unbiased and uninfluenced choice, but solely to the interference of the military—an interference which, in my judgment, (and I have nothing more to say, and shall not repeat it during the session,) amounted to as great an outrage as ever was perpetrated upon freemen.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, these statements have been made repeatedly in the Senate during the present session, and I think it is no more than just that the true grounds of the action of the Government should be stated. If an election had been pending at the time Lee was over here in Maryland with one hundred thousand armed rebels, I suppose no one would complain if the officers of the Army of the United States had prevented the soldiers of that rebel army from voting. If they had disguised themselves in the clothing of citizens and approached the polls would they have been any better entitled to vote than they were as armed soldiers of the rebel government? I apprehend not. Then, instead of prescribing the qualifications of electors in Maryland, the Government here have provided a means of detecting rebels who may, for the time being, have laid down their arms; and they, in order to test the character of the man, whether he is or is not a real citizen of the Republic and a citizen of Maryland, require that he shall first take an oath and swear that he will support the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of Maryland; and that is all there is of it. If he declines to take this oath the presumption is that he is a rebel, and that he has laid down his arms for the time being for the purpose of voting and thus effecting by his ballot what he has been unable hitherto to effect by the use of the musket.

Now, whether an abuse has been made of this purpose of the Government I am not prepared to say. It may have occurred here and there in Maryland and in other States. Men are not perfect. I suppose we do not expect to find absolute perfection in the military officers of the Government any more than the civil officers of the Republic. This, doubtless, has been the purpose, and the only purpose, on the part of the Government; and I think it was right; it was due to Maryland, who was unable to protect the civil rights of her own people, that the Government of the United States should protect them, and prevent rebels, either with arms or without arms, from voting at the polls. Nobody will pretend that, during the past year or the past three years, the people of Maryland have been able to protect the purity of her own elections, have been able to prevent rebels from voting at these elections. We have had a hundred or more thousand men in arms here for the purpose of protecting Maryland and the country adjacent thereto, and without the interference of these armed soldiers of the Republic no citizen of Maryland would have been able to discharge this right of citizenship. The complaint, I think, is founded in error.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have no right to complain of the Senator from Iowa, but I should like to know where he discovered, upon what authority he ventures the opinion, that there is not loyalty enough in Maryland to protect itself. The Legislature of Maryland elected before the recent election, was just as loyal as the Legislature of Iowa. They were, if there can be ultraism at all in such sentiment, ultra loyal; and they were abundantly competent and just as willing by any laws which they deemed necessary, to protect the ballot-box against the impurity of treasonable votes. What we object to is that they were not permitted to protect themselves, through the interference of the Executive, or a military officer acting under the presumed authority of the Executive. I say to my friend from Iowa that he is grossly mistaken if he supposes that there is any lack of loyalty in the State of Maryland. There are, no doubt, persons there whose sympathies are so strong with the South that they are unable to do the duty which they owe to their country. Are there none in the State of Iowa? I rather think such would be found. Are there none in Massachusetts; none in New York; none in Pennsylvania; none in any of the other States against whom the military has not been used? If we learn from the press of those several States, there is as much if not more disloyalty in those States than there is within the State of Maryland, and if you look to the efforts which Maryland has made, and is now making, to fly to the support of the Government, I tell the Senator from Iowa that his troops, brave and gallant as they are, are not at all the superior of the troops of Maryland. They have an ancestry which renders it almost impossible that they should be otherwise than true, loyal, and gallant; and there is not now—I am proud to say it, delighted to say it—there is not now within the limits of this great land a State in which loyalty beats stronger or more universal than it beats within the hearts of the sons of Maryland; and if the time shall come when it shall become necessary to call to the aid of the United States every man within her limits to save the Republic, there is not one of them who will be permitted to remain in her borders who hesitates for a moment to come to the standard of the United States.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I think that perhaps a little injustice has been done me by the remarks of the Senator from Maryland, unintentionally, doubtless. I did not say one word impugning the patriotism of Maryland. I only spoke of her inability to protect herself, and that is patent to the whole world.

Mr. JOHNSON. Where?

Mr. HARLAN. It has not been long since my colleague here was compelled, I was about to say, to crawl around Baltimore, the great commercial metropolis of Maryland, in order to reach the capital of the nation, on account of the disposition of the people of Baltimore.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him when?

Mr. HARLAN. Since the commencement of this rebellion.

Mr. JOHNSON. In April, 1861, when the city was crazy.

Mr. HARLAN. It has not been long since the Government of the United States was compelled to manufacture, patch up a way to bring troops to the capital of the nation, in order to avoid the commercial metropolis of Maryland, on account of the disposition of its own people. Now that there has a manifest change taken place for the better, is of course known to all. The Senator himself cannot be more gratified at that result than I am; but then, sir, it is history, and not very old history, that Maryland has been invaded, and the armies of the Republic have been assembled in multiplied thousands to drive those invaders from Maryland. It was not the fault of Maryland entirely, perhaps not to any very great extent; yet it was her misfortune. I spoke of the propriety of the interposition of the Federal Government to prevent those invaders from usurping the civil authority in Maryland, whether they had arms in their hands or whether they had thrown down their arms for the time being and disguised themselves in the clothing of citizens for the purpose of securing the privilege of voting in Maryland. That is all that the Government has attempted to do. It has done it with a greater or less degree of success in Maryland and in other places; and I think the Government ought to do so. What difference would it be whether this Republic is to be overturned by the votes of men who refuse to take an oath of allegiance, or by arms in the hands of those men? In the very district of country to which the Senator refers, down the Potomac here, it is known to the whole country that perhaps a majority of those people, at least until a very recent period, have been in open sympathy with the rebels; and the military authorities, the officers of the Army and the soldiers there, have, for the protection of the loyal people of this part of Maryland, required that those who were supposed to be disloyal should purge themselves of that implication by swearing that they would support the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of Maryland before they should be permitted to vote. What great harm in it unless it damages a man to purge himself from an implication? It is his misfortune, perhaps, but it is the result of circumstances over which this Government has no control. If a man is so surrounded that his neighbors believe that he is a disloyal man and is about to exercise the privilege of voting for the purpose of overturning the Republic, and the Government interposes and requires that he shall take an oath of this kind and thus purge himself from this implication, who is damaged? Certainly not Maryland. Does she desire that the votes of rebels should be polled? And when she has the manifest inability to protect herself in this regard, why should she complain that the Federal Government comes to her assistance?

Mr. JOHNSON. Who says that Maryland is unable to protect herself? The Senator from Iowa says so, but I do not think his evidence is conclusive on that question. Now, as to the troubles in the city of Baltimore, in April, 1861, perhaps there is no part of the State that lamented them more than the city itself; and I say now what I believed then, that it was a sudden outbreak, not meditated at all, confined to a very few. Every city has a combustible population, and whenever any particular cause of excitement is started, a few wicked men can get up a mob. Does the Senator from Iowa forget the mob that was in New York only a few months ago, excited for the very purpose of resisting a law of the United States? Does he forget the conduct of those who are charged with disloyalty in Ohio, occurring before the late election? Was there any interference with the exercise of the elective franchise in either of those States, on the ground that for the time being they were unable to protect themselves? Why, there is not a city in the Union, there is hardly a State in the Union that has not at times, owing to some local excitement, been found for a moment impotent to its own defense; but does that extinguish all its constitutional rights, and convert the Government of the United States into one consolidated mass of power, authorizing them to interfere in any way that they may think proper in order to preserve what they think should be preserved—the free exercise of the elective franchise? If they can require the oath, they can dispense with the election. If they can say who shall vote and who shall be voted for, let them say at once who shall be the representatives, or whether we shall have any representatives. What I protest against is the power. The practical operation of the exercise of the power in any particular instance is not so material; but the existence of the power is fraught with evils that the tongue of no man who is fond of constitutional freedom can adequately depict.

Mr. WILSON. I hope we shall now have a vote on this proposition. It is very important to pass the bill to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] which is, after the word "be" in the seventh line, to insert "procured in and;" so that the clause will read, "which substitutes shall be procured in and credited to that district."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the original amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President—

Several SENATORS. Let us vote.

Mr. HOWE. I am very sorry to interfere with the immediate vote on this amendment, which seems to be desired by several Senators. I would not interfere with it if I was at all sure that the amendment would be rejected. I think, however, it will not be rejected. I think it will be adopted, and I am very sorry to believe so. I tried yesterday, upon the motion of the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. NESMITH,] to abolish the commutation clause. I tried, when that motion was pending, to point out to the Senate the injustice of the operation of that clause. I tried to show the Senate that if substitutes could be had at the price fixed for commutation, no drafted man was benefited by the commutation, because he could go into the market and procure a substitute, and thus that form of exemption would come to him just as easy and just as cheap, and that the only condition upon which the drafted man could get any benefit from the commutation clause was that emergency or that occasion when substitutes could not be obtained at the price fixed for commutation; and I tried to show, therefore, that this was unjust as between man and man, that it was an edict of the national legislature saying to a man, "If you have not got $300, or $400, whatever the sum may be, with which to buy your exemption from this personal service, you must go into the ranks and serve, no matter what your labor may be worth, no matter what the sacrifice may be to you, no matter what the discomfort, no matter what is considered the market value of this service which the act imposes upon you, no matter although you cannot get a man to take your place at home for an hour; you have not got so much ready cash to buy your exemption; you must go into the ranks and serve." At the same time it says to another man, "If you have this amount of ready cash, $300, or as it now stands, $400, you may pay it to the Government and may be exempt, although the Government may not be able to procure a man to perform the service that they need of you for $1,000 or for $2,000.

I thought it was unjust to the poor man, and I do not like to vote for an injustice anywhere or under any circumstances. I do not know, however, but that I could have voted for even this wrong, but for what has occurred here. I desire to stand by the Government. I desire to administer by my votes here on all occasions to the necessities of the Republic. I am not disposed to be difficult; I am not disposed to be squeamish. Give me anything a little more respectable than petty larceny, and I will go for it. I do not mean to hesitate. Give it to me without the confession that it is larceny, and I do not know but that I could go even for this wrong. There is not a fiber in me but thrills with indignation—I am obliged to say it—when I look at this feature; but if the Senate would bestill, if the Senate would not confess that it was an outrage, that it was a wrong, I do not know but that I could vote for it; and when they sat still yesterday, and neither said that this was just nor unjust, I had not really made up my mind that I would not take the dose, bitter as I knew it would taste to me; but when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] got up here as if he was the genius of a sovereign State himself; when he held up the indignation of a million and a half of people in his two hands; when he did not stop to say simply that this is a wrong upon the man who has not got the money, and an unworthy privilege granted to the man who has; when he did not stop to speak in behalf of the pauper who has nobody to speak for him, but stood up here to speak in behalf of a State—

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. I want to ask the Senator if I understood him to say that this commutation was a wrong to the man who had not the money. I think I understood him so, and it is the first time I have heard that charge in the Senate. I heard it said last summer in the country; but our whole argument has been precisely the contrary—that the clause is inserted to help the Government because it eases the people; that it is for the benefit of the poorer classes.

Mr. HOWE. I said most distinctly that the commutation clause was a wrong to the man who has not got the money to comply with it. I have said twice before, and I repeat it, that every man owes his service to the Government if the Government needs it. No man has a right to complain because his neighbor is not compelled into the ranks, although he may be drafted, if he puts a good man there in his place; and when you allow that privilege to the drafted man, you allow him all he needs, because he can bargain with the man with whom he can bargain cheapest, and the Government is not injured; the man who has not the means to bargain is not injured, because another man is put by his side, and gives him the same support that his drafted neighbor would give if he went himself. Therefore I say the commutation clause is wrong. I said, however, that I did not know but that I could have gone for the measure if it were not for the confession which, it seems to me, this amendment makes of the wrong that is to be done. For when the Senator from Indiana arraigned the Senate for intending or attempting to pass a law which would enable Pennsylvania to commute for $300 ahead for the volunteers which she had put into the field; when he said that was a wrong done to Indiana, and not to a man; when he said that a volunteer who went from Indiana should have a soldier from Pennsylvania and from each other State to make it equal between State and State, everybody confessed it; Senators here, half a dozen of them, gathered together in convention to see if it were really so, that the law as it stood would enable Pennsylvania or any other State to relieve herself of any portion of the burden by paying money when Indiana and other States furnished men. They found it did; that cash was received from one State as a compensation, as an equivalent for soldiers from others. The purpose of this amendment is to remedy that, to make it equal between State and State, to prevent any injustice being done as between one State and another. Now, if cash be the equivalent of service; if $400 is as good as a soldier, then, when Pennsylvania pays $400, she does as much for the Government as Indiana does when she furnishes a soldier; but it is because you confess that it is not the equivalent of the soldier, that you want to make this thing equal between one State and another by this amendment. If it is wrong between one State and another, that can be remedied by this amendment; but the wrong still exists between man and man, and the wrong is confessed by the making of this amendment. Withdraw this, vote it down, keep still, do not confess the wrong, and I will try and go for the bill; but place it upon the bill, and I will not go for it. It is enough to ask me to go for a wrong that is not confessed. It is a little too much to ask me to confess the wrong and still embrace it.

Mr. GRIMES. I have one more amendment to propose to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. I move to insert the word "white" before the word "substitutes," so that it shall read, "for the procurement of white substitutes."

Mr. WILSON. I hope there will not be any "white" or "black" put into this bill. There is nothing of that kind there now, and I hope we shall keep it out. There is no need of it. It will not do any good in the world. If any Senator is worried about Massachusetts, if he will only leave her out, and not let her get soldiers anywhere, I am willing; but I must confess that I do not want to put "slave" or "free," "black" or "white" into this enrollment act.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I have not said a word about Massachusetts to-day. I have a very great affection for Massachusetts, and especially for her Senators. I am willing that Massachusetts or any other State may go down into the rebel States and recruit white men, but I want the negroes to remain there for the United States to recruit them. I want to be interested in them myself as one of the constituent portions of this Government. I want them to be recruited by the United States and put under the patronage and protection of the Federal Government; and I do not want any State, my State or any other, to be permitted to go down into Louisiana and there pick up negroes and take exclusive jurisdiction of them and claim them as part of her quota and have her responsible for them to the exclusion of other States.

I will state again that another purpose which I have is really this: I want to stimulate the Government to recruit colored men into the Army. I think, as I said the other day, that we ought to have had, and might have had two hundred thousand of them in the field to-day, so that there would not have been any necessity for this draft. Whenever we do that, there will not be any call upon my State, or Massachusetts, or Rhode Island, or Connecticut, or any other State, for a second quota. Why on earth cannot the Federal Government recruit these colored people as well as a State, if they will do it? I want the benefit of it to all the States in proportion to the Federal population.

Mr. CLARK. I have one word to say in regard to what has fallen from the Senator from Iowa in reference to stimulating the Government. He wants to stimulate the Government to recruit the black soldiers. What stimulation will it be then to put the word "white" in this section; to say in this bill, "You shall not recruit anybody but white men." Does that stimulate the Government? Is it not saying by implication, "We do not want the black man; you may recruit nobody but white men, and you shall not have a black man here?" I do not want any distinction of that kind.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, we are not arguing special demurrers here. I want to stimulate the Government to recruit colored men for the United States Government, for the benefit of the Federal nation, for the benefit of my own State, as well as other States, and not stimulate the State of New Hampshire or any other State to—

Mr. HOWE. Steal them.

Mr. GRIMES. No, I will not use that phrase. I do not want to stimulate any particular congressional district or State to recruit them for the purpose of filling out her quota, and thus deprive me of any advantages that might inure to me and my constituents, if the Government was stimulated to recruit them for the United States. That is the difference.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to know if the Senator is opposed to the States of Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri sending their colored men into the field as part of their quotas. I cannot see any reason for putting in the word "white" here. The effect will be precisely what I have just indicated. The State of Maryland cannot go on and enlist her black men and fill her quota with them. I see no reason why she should not be allowed to do so.

As to the few colored regiments that have been raised in the country, some of them were raised in the West. I believe Kansas commenced the work, and she raised a very large portion of them in the State of Missouri. We have raised but two colored regiments in all New England, and they were raised in Massachusetts. I believe in Pennsylvania they are raising two or three regiments there.

I see no reason why we should make any distinction, or why we should put the word "black" or the word "white" into this enrollment act. The act of last year provided for the enrollment of persons without distinction of color; and the Administration decided that the enrollment only applied to citizens and to free colored men, and did not extend to slaves; and they have enrolled the free colored men all over the country. Why, then, should they not go to make a part of the quota of the State in which they live? It appears to me that we are spending all this day on a matter that is of no earthly account. I do hope the Senator from Iowa will not press the insertion of the word "white" in this bill. I do not want the word "white" or "black" in a bill of this kind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator from Iowa ask for the yeas and nays on his amendment?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa proposes to amend the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, by inserting the word "white" before the word "substitutes," in the seventh line. The question is on this amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Harding, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—28.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected; and the question recurred on the amendment proposed by Mr. CLARK.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to amend the amendment, by adding to it this proviso:

Provided, That colored troops enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States shall be credited upon the quota of the State within which they are enlisted, and not upon the quota of any other State.

If they enlist them in Kentucky they ought to be credited to Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. I would suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin to insert the word "from," so as to read "within which and from which they are enlisted."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I accept that modification.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know precisely the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. If it means that although we organize and enroll these men in our States the States from which they originally came are to be credited with them, I am opposed to it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not give much attention to the effect of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, and I will not accept it as part of my amendment. I prefer to take a vote on the amendment as I introduced it.

Mr. POMEROY. In the State where I reside none of our people have been there very long, white or black. We were from Massachusetts and other States. Some men enlist in our regiments when they have not been there a fortnight, some perhaps not a week; but we do not propose to give other States the credit of them. We have got two or three regiments of colored troops, the men for which principally came to us from Missouri and Arkansas and other States. They came to our State to live, to remain, and because they wanted to come. They came there from the same motives that I went there, I suppose. They are a part of our people; we have enlisted them; they are our troops. I do not propose to give credit for them to any other State.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to strike out the words "within which" in the amendment, and in lieu thereof to substitute the words "of which they are legal residents."

Mr. SHERMAN. I doubt whether the amendment is in order at this stage. This is an amendment to an amendment, as I understand. We had better act upon one proposition at a time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is right. The pending amendment is an amendment to an amendment, and it cannot be further amended. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HARLAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I never like to give explanations for a vote until I am asked to do so; but I feel that I am compelled to explain my vote in this case. I do not intend, by voting in favor of this proposition as I shall do, to say that I agree to the policy that colored troops shall be enlisted at all, but if they are enlisted they ought to go to the credit of the locality in which they are found. And here I desire to say that I think the Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken when he says that Massachusetts has had credit only for enlistments in that State. I think there were agents of that State in Indiana, and negro troops were raised in Indiana for Massachusetts regiments. So I have understood.

Mr. WILSON. How is that?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understood that in the city of Indianapolis negro troops were organized for a Massachusetts regiment, and they went to the credit of Massachusetts. Now I think if we have negro troops they should go to the credit of the locality in which they are found, and therefore I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to adopt the explanation made by the Senator from Indiana as my own in reference to the vote I shall give on this amendment. Never by any vote in this body, under any circumstances, will I recognize the propriety of enlisting negroes in this or any other war; but if they are to be enlisted, if that is the policy of the country, and my action here cannot prevent it, I adopt the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin as just in itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Harris, Howard, Sprague, Sumner, Wilkinson, and Wilson—11.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now returns on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that there is no time specified within which the subsequent draft alluded to in the amendment is to be made, and no way by which it can be ascertained.

Mr. CLARK. That must be regulated by the War Department.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Does your section confer upon the War Department the power to designate it?

Mr. CLARK. It is not necessary; the present law does that.

Mr. DAVIS. Is it in order now to move to amend the amendment as amended?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. ANTHONY. As the amendment now stands, I understand that commutation money paid in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and employed to hire negro substitutes in South Carolina and Alabama, is to be credited to South Carolina and Alabama. I shall vote against the proposition.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not understand such to be the effect of the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. If that is the effect, I propose to change it in that respect.

Mr. ANTHONY. It certainly is so.

Mr. SHERMAN. The money cannot be expended by the Secretary of War except for the procurement of substitutes to be credited to the State. The Secretary of War would have no right to use that money in South Carolina.

Mr. ANTHONY. The amendment provides that the credit is to be given to the States within which the substitutes are raised.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the Secretary of War would have no power under this provision to use the money in South Carolina to procure substitutes for South Carolina, but he must use it to procure substitutes that can be credited to Massachusetts or Rhode Island in the case supposed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not so understand the plain English of it. As I read the amendment, the money that is paid for commutation in any of the loyal States and expended in the procurement of colored soldiers in any of the rebel States must be credited to the quotas of such rebel States.

Mr. FOSTER. They cannot be credited anywhere else according to the amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not understand such to be the effect of the proviso at all. The proviso at the end of the amendment, which has been added on my motion, simply limits the power in one particular. This commutation money which is paid into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury is to procure substitutes for the deficiency in the particular district from which the draft is made. The proviso which I have added to the section declares that colored troops are to be credited where they are enlisted. If colored troops are procured within that district they go to its quota. If it goes outside of the district and employs aliens, if you please, they can be credited to the district; but colored troops who may be enlisted outside of the district, in another State, are not to be received as substitutes for that district; but that does not authorize the Secretary of War to employ this money for that purpose. He is to use the money so as to procure substitutes for that district.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, suppose the Secretary of War obtains recruits in South Carolina, to what State are they to be credited?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suppose that where a regiment of negro troops are enlisted in South Carolina, they ought to be credited as so many troops fighting for the Union from South Carolina.

Mr. ANTHONY. Suppose they are paid for by the commutation money that is raised by Massachusetts?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. They cannot be paid for by the money from Massachusetts.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I cannot comprehend the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. Let me ask the Senator from Wisconsin why it is necessary to put it on this bill?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will answer the Senator. I understand the State of Massachusetts has in Louisiana raised one or two regiments of colored troops. It has been so said.

Mr. WILSON. It was Connecticut.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sure Connecticut has not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Was it not Wisconsin?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir, it was not Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWE. Wisconsin furnishes her own troops, and does not allow them to be beaten.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is certainly just that the colored troops which are raised in Maryland—they say they are raising colored troops in Maryland—should be credited to that State; and if while in the operations growing out of the war we are trampling down the institution of slavery and enlisting the slaves and breaking down those relations, let them have the incidental benefit that comes out of crediting to their quota of troops in the field the men enlisting into the service, black as well as white. It is but just.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise simply to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin whether the difficulty cannot be avoided by adding a provision applying this limitation to the States in which a draft may be made by the Government. Then it would apply to Maryland, to Tennessee, to Kentucky, to Delaware, and Missouri, where black persons are employed in the Army; and then it would not apply to South Carolina or to Alabama; but as fast as the Government gets possession of the rebel States, and can make a draft there, then it would apply to them. I suggest the addition of a provision to the amendment which shall make this limitation apply only to the States where the Government has drafted or hereafter may draft. I call for the reading of the amendment again.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will answer the Senator. I understand the State of Massachusetts has in Louisiana raised one or two regiments of colored troops. It has been so said.

Mr. WILSON. It was Connecticut.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sure Connecticut has not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Was it not Wisconsin?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir, it was not Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWE. Wisconsin furnishes her own troops, and does not allow them to be beaten.

It is but just.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a privileged question. I voted with the majority upon the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. I did it because, in my judgment, as it struck my ear, it was just; but at the suggestion of some friends who have given more attention to it than I have, and upon whose judgment I rely, and who suggest that the amendment has been entirely misunderstood, I move a reconsideration of the vote by which it was adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to the amendment has just been adopted. The Senator from Kentucky inquired of the Chair a moment since if it was further in order to move to amend the amendment. The Chair understood the Senator as applying his remark to the amendment to the amendment. It is in order further to amend the amendment, but not that portion of it which has just been adopted.

Mr. CLARK. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin has the effect at least to render the construction of the section as amended ambiguous. I think there had better be no ambiguity about it, and we had, perhaps, better reconsider the vote just taken, and then if the Senator from Wisconsin can make his amendment more specific, clear it of the ambiguity, we may adopt it. But the Senate will see that we have refused just now to make any distinction between the white recruit and the black recruit, implying thereby that the Secretary of War may recruit a black man with this commutation money; but this proviso is that if he does recruit him, he shall not be credited to the State furnishing the money, but he shall be credited to South Carolina if recruited there. That, I think, is the fair interpretation according to the history of the section; but that construction is denied. I think we had better avoid that ambiguity, and reconsider the vote, and perfect the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas 19, nays 22.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask that it be read as it now stands.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the commutation money paid by persons drafted in any congressional district shall be applied by the War Department for the procurement of substitutes, which substitutes shall be credited to that district in filling its quota; and if the quota of such district shall not then be full, a further draft shall be made in said district, according to the provisions of this act, and the act to which it is in amendment, and like proceedings had until the quota of such district shall be filled; but this section shall not be construed to affect in any way the commutation money paid under the eighteenth section of this act: Provided, That colored troops enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States shall be credited upon the quota of the State within which they are enlisted, and not upon the quota of any other State.

Mr. HOWARD. It seems to me that that provision has the effect of giving two credits for the same man; first, to the congressional district in which the money is paid. That money is to be employed by the Secretary of War to procure a substitute. The Secretary sees fit to employ the money to procure the substitute in South Carolina; and this provision declares that this substitute shall himself be credited to South Carolina, which has not furnished the money for procuring the substitute. If the case existed in Massachusetts, Massachusetts of course would be entitled to a credit for the money which she has paid; but the substitute being procured in South Carolina, with Massachusetts money, South Carolina, it seems to me very unjustly, is to receive a credit for that which she has not furnished at all. I am therefore opposed to the clause as it now stands. It has a double effect very clearly to my mind, if I understand it properly; but perhaps I do not.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Wisconsin would confine his amendment to those States where the draft applies, I think it would be correct; but if it extends to States where there is no enrollment and no draft, it is manifestly incorrect and unjust. I do not know anything about any State of South Carolina that is to have troops credited to her; but if the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin could be limited to districts where the draft applies, I should have no objection to it, and I am inclined to think that was his intention.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. To the form of this amendment as drawn by the Senator from New Hampshire, on the question as to what is to be done with the money that is raised in these various districts, I have not given very careful attention. In connection with another honorable Senator I spent some little time this morning in endeavoring to draw a section which would make the disposition of that money perfectly clear, and, perhaps, by reading what I had drawn I may suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire some language or form of expression which will make the first part of his section clear on that subject as to the purpose for which the money shall be employed. I had drawn it in this form:

That unless the number of substitutes, within such time after said draft as the President shall designate, is procured to procure which commutation has been paid by persons drafted within any district, there shall be another draft or drafts from time to time in such district as the President shall designate, until its quota is filled; and that the Secretary of War shall cause to be kept an account of the commutation money received from men drafted within each district in said State; and any portion of said money which may remain unexpended by him in the procuration of substitutes to fill the quota of such district shall be applied for the procuration of substitutes upon future calls in said district.

If there is any ambiguity in the amendment as it now stands before the Senate, as to the point that the money is to be expended for the benefit of the district where the money is paid, I wish the Senator from New Hampshire would adopt some form of expression to relieve it from all ambiguity.

Mr. CLARK. I think I can cure the ambiguity by adding these words at the close of the section as now amended: "and the bounty, pay, or expense of such enlistments," that is, enlistments of colored troops, "shall not be paid out of said commutation fund."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it is not in order.

Mr. CLARK. It is only adding to the section as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks otherwise.

Mr. CLARK. I submit, of course, to the ruling of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Chair will entertain the amendment. Is there any objection?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there is no difficulty in adding words.

Mr. CLARK. I do not wish to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I shall not; but if the Chair will pardon me, I beg to suggest that my proposition is merely adding additional words to the whole section as amended, to make it clear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would have no doubt that the amendment was in order if the words proposed to be added did not vary what has already been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. The Chair will pardon me for asking whether it is entirely clear that these words do vary the meaning of what has been adopted? Do they not make the meaning of the other part of the section explicit? Do they not merely make the matter more clear?

Mr. HOWARD. It strikes me that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire changes entirely the meaning of the clause. The clause, as it now stands, manifestly gives to a State in which a colored man is recruited by the use of the commutation money paid in a free State a credit to which it is not entitled, which would be a gross injustice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no doubt that it would be perfectly in order to add other words which did not change the character and meaning of the words already agreed to; but if the proposed amendment does change or modify them, or in any way alter the sense, you might as well move to amend the amendment in the body of it which has already been agreed upon. That is the impression of the Chair.

Mr. CLARK. I shall not undertake, of course, to argue the matter after the Chair has decided it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I believe that it is in order to move a substitute for the amendment as amended?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I then move as a substitute for the amendment as amended, the words contained on that paper as it stands together with the words now proposed to be added by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in order to strike out the words which the Senate have just agreed to insert, provided the motion to strike out includes other words with those which have been inserted. The motion of the Senator from Wisconsin is therefore in order to strike out all of the section after the word "that," and insert what he proposes to insert.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I make that motion. It brings us to the same result. I move to strike out all of the section after the word "that," and then to insert the section as it has been amended, together with the words which the Senator from New Hampshire has proposed to add.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the proposed amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes to amend the pending amendment by striking it all out after the word "that," and inserting in lieu of the words stricken out what will now be read.

The Secretary read the words to be inserted, as follows:

The commutation money paid by persons drafted in any congressional district shall be applied by the War Department for the procuration of substitutes, which substitutes shall be credited for that district in filling its quota; and if the quota of such district shall not then be full, a further draft shall be made in said district according to the provisions of this act and the act to which it is an amendment, and like proceedings had until the quota of such district shall be filled; but this section shall not be construed to affect in any way the commutation money paid under the eighteenth section of this act: Provided, That colored troops enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States shall be credited upon the quota of the State within which they are enlisted, and not upon the quota of any other State; and the bounty, pay, or expense of said enlistments shall not be paid out of said commutation fund.

Mr. WILSON. We have heard all around of a strong desire to raise colored troops, and some of the money that has already been obtained is used by the War Department now in raising colored troops, and this is to put an end to it. I confess I do not see the wisdom of this kind of legislation. We are paying down in General Butler's department ten dollars as a bounty to colored men. The Government is paying it out of the commutation money already paid in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They have other money out of which to pay it.

Mr. WILSON. If they have, I shall not object. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 24, noes 12.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I offer the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to call for one hundred thousand volunteers, to serve not exceeding one hundred days, to be used exclusively in connection with other troops now in service, for the purpose of driving the rebel army from the State of Virginia, and releasing the Union soldiers therein confined; the volunteers raised under this provision to receive the same pay as other volunteer soldiers now in the service, but not any bounties.

Mr. WILSON. I hope this amendment will not be pressed upon this bill. The bill is an amendment of the enrollment act, and this is a proposition which ought to stand by itself, and not be connected with the bill. If the Senator thinks it is better to raise men for one hundred days let him offer a proposition of that kind by itself; but I beg Senators not to put it upon this bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is a bill for the purpose of raising troops to put down the rebellion. Now, sir, in my judgment, if the army of Lee's in Virginia that has threatened this capital for two years can be overwhelmed and driven out of that State the rebellion will be substantially put down. I believe that one hundred thousand men added to the forces we have in the field, with the zeal and enthusiasm with which they would go into the service, uniting with the old troops, the veteran troops who have seen service for the last two or three years, would expel that army from Virginia not only in one hundred days, but I believe they would do it in thirty days after they had united with the other forces.

As to obtaining the men I have no sort of doubt. I received a letter from the State of Illinois this morning from an officer, who states that a regiment can be raised in a week which will arm and clothe itself for this service. I believe you will get the troops; I think you will accomplish the object; and when that object is accomplished, in my opinion the rebellion will be substantially crushed. I think it is the most effective way to raise and to accomplish the object we all have in view. It is with that view I offer it. It seems to me this is the very place to offer it, on a bill to raise troops to crush this rebellion.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator expresses the opinion that this is the place to put a measure of this kind. I do not agree with him in that. I think that if a proposition of this kind is to be entertained it should stand by itself as a separate measure; but I, for one, believe it is the wildest kind of proposition that can be made, costly to the Government, and of no value on earth. What, sir, one hundred thousand men to drive the rebels out of Virginia! Suppose you bring one hundred thousand militia into the field and arm and equip them at enormous expense, what will they be worth when you come to launch them on veteran armies? They will be of no account on earth. It will be an enormous expenditure of the resources of this country for no purpose on earth.

I hope this proposition will not be pressed upon this bill, which I have endeavored to keep entirely as a bill proposing amendments to the enrollment act. We shall have some other military bills here within a day or two to which it may more appropriately be offered; but I think a measure of this kind, to raise one hundred thousand militia or volunteers at this time for one hundred days, should stand by itself, and let us vote upon it by itself.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator from Illinois would increase the number to three hundred thousand.

Several SENATORS. Make it a million.

Mr. HOWE. The Government is supplied with any quantity of arms, as I am informed. The Senator from Massachusetts thinks these men cannot be raised, and thinks they would be useless if they were raised. I am impressed with the belief that he is mistaken upon both points. I introduced a proposition here the other day, which some of my friends have—I suppose intending to flatter my judgment at the expense of my sincerity—professed to think was intended as a joke. I never was more sincere in a proposition in my life. I believe the men would come, come at once, and I believe they would do good work when they did come; and if the Government will consent to arm the people of the loyal States, I believe you can put an army on every road that leads into Virginia within ninety days as large as that which defends the direct road to Virginia.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask my friend if he thinks we could put one on the road south of Richmond?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How are you going to get them there?

Mr. HOWE. Through North Carolina very easily, by way of Goldsborough.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask my friend another question, whether he can give us any assurance that while we are raising these one hundred thousand men the prisoners will be kept at Richmond, retained there until our men get there to take them?

Mr. HOWE. They might not wait for the execution of a proposition of that kind; and if they would retire before a threat, is it not worth something to the Government that they should retire?

Mr. FESSENDEN. But the prisoners themselves, would they not be sent off to some other place?

Mr. HOWE. Let me say to the Senator from Maine that if they will be content to send the prisoners further South and to remain there themselves, we shall be abundantly able to make reprisals to indemnify the people of the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That would not release the prisoners.

Mr. HOWE. The honorable Senator admits that the proposition to arm these people would amount to something. If it would not secure the withdrawal of that body of men who call themselves the government of the confederate States, but would lead to the withdrawal of the prisoners, why would it lead to that? Because they would not be safe at Richmond. If they would not be safe, that organization called the government of the confederate States would not be safe.

I have had piles of letters on this subject within a few days. I received a letter from Pennsylvania the other day from a gentleman whom I do not know, saying that he had a hundred men in his employ, and that he and every man he had would go if the Government would arm them. A gentleman, one of the most energetic men I know in Wisconsin, was in the gallery when my proposition was offered, and he said that every man capable of bearing arms in Wisconsin could be put under arms, and he could arm a regiment in twenty-four hours. I have had letters from Massachusetts, I have had letters from New York, and from other States to the same effect.

The President of the United States has said a great many true things, and one of the truest things he ever said I think he said in 1861, and that was that the people of the United States would put down this rebellion if the Government but did its duty indifferently well. I want to improve upon that remark, if it be possible to improve upon it, by saying to-day that the people of the United States will put down this rebellion if you will let them do it. I do not know that one hundred thousand men would be adequate in one hundred days to achieve any decided advantages, but you can have three hundred thousand as quickly as one hundred thousand, and the more you call for the more you will have. I know that in 1861, when the first call was made, almost every man in the loyal States got up at once and was ready to offer his services. A great deal of fault has been found with the army of the Potomac. It has seemed to me that the army of the Potomac has had too heavy a burden, too heavy a labor imposed upon it. It has had the double duty imposed upon it of defending Washington and of taking Richmond. The result of that double duty is that they have been required so far to go toward Richmond over just such route as General Lee's army has prescribed to them; and if General Lee, having the choice of position and standing on the defensive, cannot defend Richmond against any one hundred thousand men you can send there, he ought not to command an army. Let an army stand between Richmond and Washington; call for other men to go where Lee is not; take routes which he does not prescribe to you. General Lee has not been able to march over the army of the Potomac when commanded by Meade, or Hooker, or anybody else, but twice he has marched around that army. I wish the Senator from Illinois would increase the number that he proposes to raise. I shall vote for the proposition anyhow.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. In a few weeks from now, I shall be willing to vote for such a proposition as this; but I submit to the Senator from Illinois whether it will not prevent the Government from filling up the old Army, and turn the attention of the people to this more favorite service. I hope that the Senate will not adopt the proposition. After we have filled our old Army, I shall vote heartily for a proposition of this kind; but not till then.

Mr. WADE called for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and they were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should have no objection to raising one hundred thousand men for the specific purpose stated in the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, but for two reasons. I have no doubt that the men could be had, provided the money could be had; and that the men, if they could be at once in the service of the United States for any practical purpose, might accomplish the object which we all have so much at heart, the driving of the rebel authorities from Richmond. But the cost of one hundred thousand men, I think, is at an average of about $100 a man, and that is $10,000,000. The cost of transportation certainly will be half as much more. But then, when we have got the money, if it is to be had, and we have got the men into our service, and we have got from time to time the means of transporting them to the scene of operations, I rather think the hundred days would be pretty much exhausted, and you will find yourself at the end of that period with one hundred thousand men on your hands who would have only a few weeks to serve after you had expended some fifteen or twenty million dollars.

The second reason which will operate on my mind in the vote I shall give on this question is that I think the practical effect of the amendment, if adopted, will be to suspend the operation of this enrollment act for at least one hundred days, for I suppose it must be very obvious that if men can be paid the same rate, or nearly the same rate, for a short service of three months, they will not be found enlisting for a period of three years. In other words, they will prefer the short service to the long service; and if they do prefer the short service to the long service, then the enlistment for three months of such of them as would enlist for the long service but for the privilege of enlisting for the short service, will postpone the practical operation of the bill which is on our table. I suggest, therefore, to the honorable Senator from Illinois that perhaps, on consideration, he will see that he may be doing more harm than good if he shall succeed in getting this particular measure adopted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, perhaps we look upon this rebellion and the power of the rebel armies from different points of view. I never would have offered a premium of $300 or $400 for men who have yet twelve months to serve, to reenlist. It looks to me very much like an admission that this rebellion was not to be put down for twelve months to come. The feeling of the people of this country is that the rebellion has already lasted longer than it ought to have lasted. They have been willing to make any sacrifices that the Government required either of men or money, to submit to any taxation, and to volunteer themselves. The only difficulty we have had in filling our armies with volunteers has been an impression that the war was not to be prosecuted with efficiency. Satisfy the country that the troops to be raised are to be moved at once upon the rebel armies, and you will get men enough. That was the understanding in the earlier stages of the war. Now, there is a very general impression all over the country, so far as I know, that this rebellion is to be put down in the spring campaign. There is a general feeling that we can do it then as well as in a dozen campaigns. We want men to do it. I think, if you will say to the people of this country that you desire one hundred thousand men to come forward and unite with the armies we now have in the field for one hundred days for a specific purpose, that you will get them.

I do not agree at all with the Senator from Massachusetts that they will be worthless. Why, sir, some of the best fighting men we have had in this war, men who have behaved as bravely as any others under the most trying circumstances, have been the new regiments. Men from my State who had not been thirty days in service have fought as well in the battles in the West as those who have been a year in the service. Such has been the case with the soldiers from Michigan, from Vermont, and other States. Take these one hundred thousand men, with the enthusiasm they will bring, and put them in with the old soldiers who have served, and I tell you they will not turn their backs on the foe in battle. I should have no apprehension of a stampede from such men.

I believe so far from this costing the Government money, as the Senator from Maryland suggests, it is the most economical way to put down this rebellion. Perhaps the Senator from Wisconsin is right that we should call for a greater number. I believe you could get more. I believe the men could be raised in the next forty days, that we would have them by the 1st of March ready to move, and then, giving them the hundred days, it reaches until midsummer, the time to accomplish the object, if it can be accomplished at all.

But, sir, I am not disposed to take up time on this bill which has delayed us so long. All I ask is to have a vote on the proposition. If it does not meet the approbation of Senators, vote it down. In my judgment the most economical and the most efficient way to put down this rebellion is to raise a sufficient force to put it down during the next campaign, and early in the campaign.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat: whether existing laws do not authorize the President to call out such force as he thinks the exigencies of the war require for such a length of time as he may designate, not exceeding three years, and whether as Commander-in-Chief he has not the authority to appoint them to such service as he desires? Is not that the existing law?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I believe that the President has authority to call out troops, but I want an expression of the opinion of Congress on this subject, and a direction to raise these troops for a specific purpose.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I will ask the Senator if it would not be better for Congress to express its views in the form of resolution, and not to reenact what is on the statute-book?

Mr. TRUMBULL. In my judgment it would not. I would make it the law, and then it is the duty of the Executive to execute it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I believe there is a very strong feeling throughout the country in regard to the condition of our prisoners at Richmond. I know it to be the case in my immediate neighborhood in Connecticut, from which there are some hundreds who have been confined there and on Belle Island ever since last June. Some of them have suffered death; many still survive, daily suffering what must, if protracted, result in death or in broken constitutions. Any intimation to the country of a call to relieve these men would be hailed in the vicinity in which I reside with great enthusiasm. I have had letters within the last few weeks from respectable men in that district on the subject, and one in particular from a gentleman who stated that if a call of this sort could be made, he would be responsible to furnish and to head fifteen hundred men. There would be a wild enthusiasm in many sections of the country were this call made, and men would flock to the standard in great numbers.

But I confess, sir, I have serious doubts about the expediency of making this attempt in this way. After receiving these letters, I conversed with the President and with our military authorities on the subject, and they discouraged the scheme. I confess that my feelings were in favor of it, and I did not see the difficulties which the military men did see, and which they pointed out. It would certainly be arrogant for me to oppose my judgment to theirs, for they are skilled and experienced men. I must say, however, that in my judgment this would be an exceedingly popular measure. Men, brave men would come at this call, men prepared to lay down their lives freely, unshrinkingly, to relieve their suffering fellow-citizens at Richmond.

I scarcely know what is best, or how to vote upon this question. I certainly feel with the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Military Committee, that it is not desirable to incumber this bill. If this proposition should be attached to this bill, we might just as well not pass it, for it would be this clause, and this only, that would be effective in the country, if we do pass it. Everything else in the bill might as well be out of it as in it if this clause is in, for this would be the whole of it; and if the service was to be for one hundred days, during that one hundred days not one single thing under the bill would be done. The attention of the country would be attracted to and absorbed by this measure until the one hundred thousand were raised and this work accomplished.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. I wish he would explain to the Senate why it is, the President being authorized to call for one hundred thousand volunteers to serve for one hundred days, that that of itself should prevent him from going on and drafting men if he sees fit to do so to serve for three years?

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt, so far as the compulsory part of the bill is concerned, that might be carried out. I spoke of the inducements in the bill to volunteer. All but the compulsory part of it would be suspended; for no man would volunteer for three years while this call was pending for one hundred days. All the blood of the country would be stirred with this proposition, and there would be apathy in reference to all else; and the campaign of the next year, and indeed everything but this individual enterprise, would be dead, practically dead. Now, sir, whether it is better to put everything else in peril for the sake of this, I doubt.

How are these men to be officered? Are they to be officered by men now in the service, or are the officers to be selected from those who thus volunteered. The Senator from Illinois suggested, "mix them with the old Army; put them in with the old regiments." In that case we should have precisely the same military policy carried out which we have now. I do not believe it would be acceptable to these volunteers to be mingled with the troops now in the field. I believe they would insist upon being led by officers taken from themselves directly toward the object for which they volunteered. If the call should be limited, compelling those who volunteered to unite with the troops now in the field and act with them, I do not believe the call would be effective.

If general, and if called to act independently, the people would regard it somewhat in the light of a crusade; it would be a crusade, and it would spread as the crusade did under the preaching of Peter the Hermit. The people would swarm; and I confess I have some doubts whether they would not go in such overwhelming force as to overrun the whole rebel States. We cannot estimate the power of such a body of men as would be thus raised. It would reach secret springs in this country that have not yet been touched. It would show a power in our people which would astonish mankind. I am by no means prepared to say that it would not be the shortest, cheapest, and best mode of extinguishing this rebellion; indeed I confess to a considerable degree of confidence that it would. But it is a measure so bold, and it endangers so many other great and important interests, that with my limited knowledge of military affairs I will not take the responsibility of recommending it.

Mr. NESMITH. I desire to inquire if it is in order to move to amend the amendment now pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. NESMITH. Then I move to strike out "one hundred days" and insert "three years."

Mr. WILSON. As Senators have so much confidence in this proposition of the Senator from Illinois to raise one hundred thousand men for one hundred days, who are to do such wonderful things for the country, I hope they will allow this bill to pass and bring this subject in as a separate measure, and I will stay here to pass it at once if they can. I want to get this bill through to-night. I think it is of vital importance to finish it to-night.

Several SENATORS. It cannot be done.

Mr. WILSON. We shall not pass it if we continue as we are going on. I hope this proposition will not be pressed on this bill, but will be brought in as an independent measure; and when it comes in as an independent measure I think we shall have a discussion on it.

Mr. CONNESS. There seem to be two objections to this proposed scheme; one of which has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs: it would inumber the enrollment bill and should not be added to it, but should be left, if it is to be a scheme attempted to be made practicable at all, to be presented as a separate proposition. The Senator from Maryland gave the other reason, which it seems to me is conclusive in the matter; and that is, that it would necessarily interfere with the raising of the three hundred thousand men that have been called for. If it is a scheme practical at all, let it come in as a separate proposition, and let us get the men called for first.

The proposition seems to me to be a senatorial or legislative mode of taking Richmond or suppressing the rebellion, rather than a military mode. Military men say you cannot fight battles well nor meet veterans except by veterans and with veterans; and I am very much inclined to accept their judgment. But I do not wish to discuss the proposition except to say that I shall be compelled to vote against it, at any rate as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. HOWE. I have no choice upon the question whether this proposition comes to a vote of the Senate as an amendment to the bill now pending, or whether it be offered as an independent measure. I think it very likely it might be made more efficient as an independent measure; but I submit that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from Maryland, and the Senator from California are mistaken in supposing that as an amendment to this bill it em-barrasses it at all. I cannot see how it makes it one whit more or less inefficient. If it be more acceptable to Congress with this amendment than without it, then the measure will be supported; if it be less acceptable, then the amendment will probably be rejected; so that the bill is not likely to be embarrassed any way.

But the Senator from Maryland has suggested, and the Senator from Connecticut seemed to think he was right, that if this amendment was adopted it would supersede all the provisions of the bill now on our table; and yet the Senator from Connecticut admits that it would not interfere with the execution of the bill so far as it is compulsory. Well, I understand it is nothing else but a compulsory measure. I do not understand that the bill now on our tables provides for any volunteering at all. That is provided for by another measure, in which the President is authorized to offer bounties of $300 and $400 up to the 1st of March. Instead of the adoption of such a measure as is now proposed by the Senator from Illinois interfering with volunteering and with those bounties, I think it would weaken volunteering, because that bounty is earned by volunteering to the end of the war, and I think a man would be more likely to enlist for the war if he found a large military force of two or three hundred thousand men were to be put into the field for one hundred days, because it would tend—and that is the very purpose of the proposition—to expedite the progress of the war and to hasten the end of it. The Senator from Illinois believes, and I believe, that a proper volunteer force put into the field would in one hundred days end the war. The bounty of $300 or $400 would be earned then in one hundred days' service, and I think the adoption of just such a measure would quicken volunteering.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, which is to strike out "one hundred days" and insert "three years."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected; there being, on a division—ayes thirteen, noes not counted.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "that," where it first occurs in the amendment, the words "after the three hundred thousand men called for by the President in his recent proclamation shall have been raised."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will not insist upon that amendment; because, if we are to wait until the execution of this draft and three hundred thousand men are obtained under it, this matter goes over for this year, and would be of no service for the next campaign. I trust he will not persist in his amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It comes just precisely to this: if we postpone the three hundred thousand to raise this one hundred thousand for one hundred days, then the three hundred thousand goes over this year; and if you postpone the one hundred thousand for one hundred days until we get the three hundred thousand for three years, we will not only take Richmond and relieve our prisoners, but will put down the rebellion everywhere. We shall not get our prisoners until we have the rebellion put down everywhere, because they will take the prisoners with them to their last stronghold. That is precisely the question, in my opinion. The one postpones the other; and I prefer to go in for the three hundred thousand men to be soldiers to put down the rebellion everywhere, to recapture all the prisoners and all the forts, and put the enemy to the last ditch.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Wisconsin certainly does not mean to say that the raising of this one hundred thousand men has anything to do with the enforcement of the draft? This bill is to raise men by draft. Will the raising of one hundred thousand volunteers prevent that?

Mr. WILKINSON. They are inconsistent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator thinks so he can offer his amendment. I cannot see that they are at all inconsistent.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator from Illinois to withdraw this amendment, and let it come up on Monday as a separate proposition. He can just as well bring this in separately, and I do not see any reason why it should embarrass this bill or take up our time now. It is certainly a proposition that ought to consume a day in the discussion, for I think it is a matter that can be demonstrated as clear as any problem in mathematics that there has been no time since this war took place that you could raise and put one hundred thousand men in the field under seventy-five days, and an enormous expenditure to the country, and when you get the men ready for service, their time will be out. I hope this proposition will not be pressed to-day. It can be brought in early next week.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I offer an amendment in the shape of a substitute, to strike out all after the word "that," and insert the following:

The President of the United States be authorized to provide transportation and equipments for three hundred thousand men in addition to the amount now on hand.

I feel a great deal of solicitude about this proposition of the Senator from Illinois. I feel that if we adopt it it will be turning a tiger loose upon the country. I have had a great deal to do with the enlistment of soldiers, and I venture the assertion that the moment this amendment passes all volunteering in any other direction will cease. When we proposed volunteering for three years, and the time for enlistments in the regular Army was five years, enlistments in the regular Army ceased entirely. This will create a furor in the country that, I venture to say, has never been equaled. So far as the State I represent is concerned, if you allow the President of the United States to call for volunteers for the purpose of relieving the prisoners at Richmond, they would enlist en masse for one hundred days or two hundred days. I will make this further statement: that, with the condition of the Government at present, it would take one hundred days for the Government to procure transportation and equipment for that one hundred thousand men. While they may have arms, they have not the tents, clothing, and transportation.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I think the longer the passage of this bill is delayed the better it is for the country. It is now getting late, and important propositions are brought in which promise us a very interesting debate if we adjourn. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that motion is put I wish to introduce another motion, that the bill be printed with all the amendments. It is important that that should be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will entertain the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts if there be no objection. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill with the amendments will be ordered to be printed. The Senator from Indiana now moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. With the unanimous consent of the Senate, I desire to submit an amendment with a view to have it printed. I think there will be no objection to it. If there is, I will withdraw it at once.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be received, if there be no objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to send up an amendment to the bill, which I ask to have printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be received and ordered to be printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. As Senators seem to desire it, I will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn, and the question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GRIMES. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know if the Senate has not already ordered the bill out of its possession and ordered it to be printed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not necessarily out of its possession.

Mr. WILSON. I think we can pass this bill to-night. ["Oh, no."] I am sure we ought to do it. Here we have these propositions put upon it, and we have spent two or three hours to-day, it seems to me, on questions that hardly concern the bill at last. I do hope that we shall sit here and finish the bill to-night.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays, that we may understand that the enemies of the bill move to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill of which I have not given previous notice.

Mr. COLLAMER. I object to anything being presented. If those who avow themselves opposed to this bill move adjournments and insist upon it, I insist that the question of adjournment shall be taken. I am opposed to an adjournment altogether.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Dixon, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Ramsey, Sanbury, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—26.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask to have it reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is to strike out all of the original amendment, and to insert:

That the President of the United States be authorized to provide transportation and equipments for three hundred thousand men in addition to the number of men now in the service.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Carlile, Davis, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Pomeroy, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Powell, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—31.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK. There is an amendment which I think ought to be made in the bill, to make it uniform. We commute now the service of a man drafted, unless he be one conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms, at $400; but we commute the hospital service of those who are conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms at $300. I think that should be made $400 to conform to the other provision. I do not know any way to reach it, unless by the unanimous consent of the Senate, except by moving a reconsideration; but if there be no objection, it can be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, that modification can be made. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill will be modified accordingly.

Mr. CONNESS. I sent up an amendment to the desk a short time since, which I should like to have acted upon now. It is to add as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to prevent or prohibit the enlistment of men in the States in rebellion under the orders of the War Department.

I am afraid there are some inconsistencies in the amendments that have been made, and this will make that point clear. I presume there is no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I offer the following amendment as an addition to the fifth section, which is the proposition introduced by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment having been agreed to in that form, the Senator's amendment would not be in order to it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I will propose it as an additional section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will make it in order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My amendment is to add the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That if the person drafted be in the enjoyment of an annual income of $2,000, he shall be required to pay $500; and if the drafted person be a married man who labors for a livelihood at some trade or occupation, and is not possessed of unincumbered property exceeding in value $700, and whose yearly earnings or wages do not exceed $400, he may in like manner pay $150, and shall thereupon be entitled to the like exemption.

I do not care to discuss this amendment. We have increased the rate of commutation to $400. That puts it out of the power of a very large number of people to pay that sum. I propose now that men of wealth whose incomes exceed $2,000 shall pay $500; and then we can well afford to say that those who are of limited means may pay $150. This is very much like the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I can see no objection to it, and I should like to have it adopted. I could not support the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] because it did not tend to relieve the poor man, but placed an unequal tax upon men of wealth. This proposition is free from that objection.

Mr. COLLAMER. As I understood the reading of the amendment, it is that if a man is drafted who is worth so much as $2,000, he shall pay $500. It does not say what for. Now it would be pretty hard to draft a man and make him pay $500 without saying what it was for.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The words "for commutation" can be inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Those words will be added.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us have the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to amend the amendment by inserting after the words "income of $2,000" the words, "or taxable property exceeding $5,000." I propose also to strike out "$150," in the latter clause of the amendment, and to insert "$200." I think if we do that, we shall be able to make an average of from $350 to $400. There are so many more persons who have property of less than $700 than there are persons who have property of over $5,000 that we shall hardly make an average of the $400 if we let it stand at $150. If we require $500 from those who have an income of $2,000, or $5,000 worth of taxable property, and then allow a person who is married and has only $700 worth of property to commute by the payment of $200, that would make it very fair.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the Senator from Indiana means the net income of a man. With his permission, therefore, I propose to insert the word "net" before "income" in his amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Massachusetts supposes that a man who has $5,000 of taxable property ought to be put upon the same footing with the one who has an income of $2,000. I would suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that in very many cases, perhaps in a majority of cases, men are assessed at $5,000 who have very little property. The effect of such a tax as that would be to compel them to sell a portion of their real or taxable estate. It is a very unsatisfactory way of ascertaining the means a man has, in order to require $500 from him, to look alone to his taxable property. In the western States, except in the cities, where property of that description yields more or less of income, a great many men are taxed for more than $5,000 who cannot raise a dollar except by mortgaging their estate. The result would be, a man would be taxed out of his whole estate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes to amend the amendment by striking out "$150" and inserting "$200."

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I have just come in, and I should like to have the amendment reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read as it has been modified.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That if the person drafted be in the enjoyment of a net annual income of $2,000, he shall be required to pay $500 for commutation; and if the drafted person be a married man who labors for a livelihood at some trade or occupation, and is not possessed of property exceeding in value $700, and whose yearly net earnings or wages do not exceed $400, he may in like manner pay $150, and shall thereupon be entitled to like exemption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment is to strike out "$150" and insert "$200;" and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Cowan, Davis, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Sanbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wright—21.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts what his amendments are? I do not understand.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to amend the amendments by substituting "two hundred" for "one hundred and fifty." That has just been voted upon and lost; and by adding, "or taxable property exceeding $5,000." And I think the $2,000 ought to be reduced down to $1,500 at least.

Mr. HOWARD and others. Down to $1,000.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the chairman of the committee suggest that it ought to be $1,500 I will not object. I am willing to modify the proposition so as to require persons whose net income is $1,500 to pay $500; but I think the other would not be proper. I cannot accept that, and I suggest that he withdraw it. There are very many men who have a property assessed at $5,000 who have but very little income, a mere home, and it would be hard upon them with a small income to pay so large a sum.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to strike out the words "two thousand" and to insert "one thousand" instead.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his amendment?

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator desires to test that question.

Mr. HOWARD. I think it better.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts is understood to withdraw his amendment. The Senator from Michigan moves to amend by striking out "$2,000" and inserting "$1,000."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe the proposition has not been changed by any action of the Senate. I accepted the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the committee, to insert $1,500 instead of $2,000. It has been so modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the impression of the Chair it is not now in the power of the Senator from Indiana to modify his amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I supposed there would be no objection to that modification of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so modified if there be no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. I object to that. I think that entirely too high as the minimum income.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on striking out "$2,000," and inserting "$1,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] desired the yeas and nays upon a motion to adjourn a short time ago, in order that he might learn who were the enemies of this bill. I believe that was his declared object. Sir, the enemies of this bill are the men that have been consuming day after day and week after week in talking it to death; and I am sorry to say that Senator comes within that category as one of the enemies of the bill.

Now, sir, with regard to this amendment, in my State there is not one man in one hundred that will not come under that $150 exemption clause. If you mean to fix the exemption at $150, vote that amendment; but if you desire $400, or any other given sum, reject it. You may go through

New England and you will not find one man in one hundred in all New England who will not come in under the $150 exemption as placed in the amendment. If you want $150, and do not want men, vote for the amendment. If you want men, do away with that exemption entirely, and have your men come up and serve or furnish substitutes. I am opposed to this whole theory of commutation. The Government wants men and not money. It will get no men under this provision, and the enemies of this bill will vote for this amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will reply to my honorable friend after we have passed the bill, on some other occasion.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have not opened my lips to-day in reference to this bill. I have sought earnestly to perfect it; but if this amendment is adopted I shall feel constrained to vote against the bill. In my judgment it will be far worse to the country than to leave the original bill as it now stands. I agree with what has been said here, that under it nine tenths of the drafted men will escape by paying a commutation of $150. We cannot afford to reduce the commutation at that rate. We must raise the commutation, or at least hold it where it is, and in my judgment it will be fatal to the bill if this amendment is adopted.

The question was taken by yeas and nays; and resulted—yeas 6, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Saulsbury, Wilkinson, and Wright—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—34.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the sixth section in the third line by striking out "three" and inserting "third"; and in the eleventh line by striking out "three" and inserting "third." It is a mere verbal correction.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I now move that the bill be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. The printing has been already ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California moves that the bill as amended be printed.

Mr. COLLAMER. Let us see whether we cannot take the question on the bill itself. Unless gentlemen have some other amendments to propose, let us pass the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. It can be printed afterwards.

Mr. CONNESS. I withdraw the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no other amendment, the question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not know what is in this bill. I have given pretty good attention to it, but there have been many amendments submitted and acted on. Some of them have been adopted and some rejected. I do not know how the bill reads, and I am not willing to vote for it without knowing what is in it, and I prefer not to vote against it. I think it would be better if the chairman of the Military Committee would consent that it should go over until Monday, and let it be printed that we may see what is in the bill. He may remember that we passed a bill a short time ago prohibiting the payment of bounties after the 5th day of January, and in a very few days afterwards we were called upon to vote for a law repealing that law. It seems to me that a delay of one day will not materially affect the interests of the country, and I therefore move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Monday.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me that the bill is in a very good shape indeed; it is substantially as reported by the committee, with some amendments which I think generally are improvements of the bill. One or two of those amendments I have voted against, but I am certainly willing they should go to the House of Representatives, and it does seem to me important to close it this week. I think it important that the bill should be passed at an early day, for it will take some little time to send out the instructions to the country, and have the people understand what its provisions are. It will unquestionably go into operation on the 1st of March. It ought to be put into operation within a very few days.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, on the motion to postpone the further consideration of this bill until Monday.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. Is it in order to ask for the reading of the bill throughout?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in order for the Senate to order it to be read. A paper having been once read cannot be read again, if objected to, unless it be ordered by the Senate. It will be read, unless objected to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I take it that when the question comes, "Shall the bill be read a third time?" any member has the right to have it read at length.

Mr. SHERMAN. After it has been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. COLLAMER. After it has been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time any member has the right to insist on its being read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is another stage. The question now is on ordering it to be read a third time. After the Senate has so ordered, the bill will be read the third time, and may be read at length.

Mr. HARLAN. I would suggest to my friend the Senator from Vermont that I suppose at the period which he indicates it will be too late to amend the bill if some imperfection should appear.

Mr. COLLAMER. There may be that objection to it; but that is all. It could undoubtedly be read then.

Mr. HARLAN. It will require but a few moments to read the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill will be read. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If objected to, the question will be on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It does seem to me that nothing particular can be gained by this course, and we had better see this bill. The request of the Senator from Iowa is not an unreasonable one. I do not think there is any factious opposition to delay the bill. We can take a vote on it in a few minutes. It seems to me that if a Senator wishes to see it we had better postpone it. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that after the bill is ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, it will be open to a motion to reconsider on Monday, and I think we had better get it beyond the stage where it can be amended. We had better go at least that far. Let us get rid of this bill at that stage at least this week.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. TEN EYCK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Dixon, Harding, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harris, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Powell, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—19.

WASHINGTON PASSENGER RAILWAY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent the Chair would like to present a communication from the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company. It is the annual report of that corporation, made according to law. The Chair hears no objection.

The communication was received, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON. Before the announcement is made of the vote on the adjournment, may we not, by unanimous consent, have an order made to print the pending bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill will be ordered to be printed. The Chair hears no objection: the order is made. Upon the motion to adjourn the yeas are 20 and the nays are 19; so the Senate stands adjourned until Monday next at twelve o'clock.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 18, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

WASHINGTON PASSENGER RAILWAY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF UNITED STATES SENATE,

WASHINGTON, January 18, 1864.

SIR: In obedience to the resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, directing me to communicate to the Senate "whether the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company has made any report to Congress in accordance with the provision of its charter," I have the honor to state that the report of that company was laid before the Senate on the 16th instant.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

J. W. FORNEY, Secretary.

HON. H. HAMLIN, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. It will be noticed that the report was made after the resolution of inquiry was passed. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of Charles J. Gilman and others, citizens of Brunswick, Maine, praying that the aid asked by the South American Steamship Company to establish mail communication by steam vessels with the countries of South America may be given; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER presented two petitions of citizens of Detroit, Michigan, praying for an appropriation for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of an appropriation of lands to endow female colleges in the several States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented the memorial of Edward C. Doran, paymaster in the United States Navy, praying for the legalization of certain payments and vouchers therefor made from moneys realized from drafts surrendered by him at the Norfolk navy-yard in April, 1861; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of John F. Hewins and others, of the forty-second and forty-fourth regiments of Massachusetts volunteers, who enlisted into the service of the United States for the term of nine months, praying that they may be allowed a bounty of twenty-five dollars; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WADE. I present two petitions, one from the Society of Friends in Ohio, and the other from a like Society in southern Indiana and eastern Illinois, praying to be exempted from military duty on account of their conscientious scruples. As that subject is under consideration, I move that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Maine, praying that the surviving officers and soldiers of the war of 1812 and the Mexican war, who have been paid for only a part of the time since their services were rendered, may be allowed back pay up to the time their pensions commenced, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Patrick W. Douglas, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COLLAMER, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred a resolution submitted by Mr. Foot on the 14th of December, 1863, in relation to the establishment of a library for the Senate, submitted an adverse report, which was concurred in.

Mr. COLLAMER. The memorial of George W. Greene, praying that Congress will subscribe for fifteen hundred copies of a publication of the letters and dispatches of General Nathaniel Greene during the revolutionary war to enable him to print them, was referred to the Committee on the Library; and I have been directed by that committee to say that they regard these papers of very great value and very great public interest, but the condition of the finances in the present pressure upon the country is such that we think it advisable not to entertain the proposition at present. The committee, therefore, report adversely upon the petition.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. DIXON. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred a resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] directing that clerks of the standing committees who have been on duty since the first day of the session be paid from that time, have instructed me to report it back with a recommendation that it pass.

The resolution was considered, and agreed to; as follows:

Resolved, That such of the clerks of the standing committees of the Senate as have been on duty since the first day of the session be paid therefrom.

SMALL-POX IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report the facts in reference to the existence of small-pox in the District, with a resolution on that subject.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That in the judgment of the Senate it would be advisable, as a precautionary measure, for the city authorities of Georgetown and Washington to furnish to all the families in said cities the means of vaccination at their places of residence, and at the public expense where individuals are unable or unwilling to defray the expense as a private charge; and that they require such children as for any reason have failed to be vaccinated to absent themselves from the public schools until they shall have complied with the requisitions of the city governments in this respect; and it is respectfully recommended to the authorities of said cities to take immediate action in this direction.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that the operation of the resolution should include the country on the other side of the river as well as the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. SUMNER. Let it be read again.

The Secretary read the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. MORGAN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to facilitate proceedings in admiralty and other judicial proceedings in the port of New York, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILKINSON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution extending the benefits of the bounty granted by the act of July 22, 1861, to certain soldiers who entered the service of the United States prior to May 3, 1861.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 62) to remove all disqualification of color in carrying the mails; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 64) to incorporate the North American Land and Emigration Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HOWE. I am requested to present a bill establishing a Bureau of Emancipation. It is not drawn by myself. It is drawn by another gentleman who has given a good deal of attention to the subject. Previous notice has not been given of its introduction, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce it. I must say, at the same time, that although I have looked it over pretty carefully, and I entirely approve of many of the provisions and all the objects of the bill, yet there are some provisions in it in which I do not concur, but I am inclined to think there ought to be a law enacted on this subject.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce the bill (S. No. 63) establishing a Bureau of Emancipation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To what committee does the Senator wish it referred?

Mr. HOWE. The committee on freedmen and slavery is the appropriate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to the select committee having those subjects in charge.

Mr. JOHNSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 19) of thanks of Congress to Commodore Cadwallader Ringgold, and the officers and crew of the United States ship Sabine; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRINTING OF BILLS.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 18) in relation to the public printing; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ANTHONY. This resolution comes from the Committee on Printing, and is merely intended to facilitate the convenience of the Senate in the printing of bills. At the last session we reduced the number to be printed of bills and reports very largely, and we reduced the number of bills a little too much, about one hundred, and there are not enough now printed to supply the members and the press. It is very desirable that the press should have them. This joint resolution increases the number to be printed, and puts it at seven hundred; it is now six hundred. I will therefore ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which proposes to repeal the second section of the joint resolution approved March 3, 1863, and directs the Superintendent of Public Printing to print hereafter seven hundred copies of every bill and joint resolution ordered or required to be printed by either the Senate or the House of Representatives under any rule of either House, unless some other number be specially required by the House ordering the same.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL REFERRED.

Mr. HALE. At an early part of the session I introduced a bill, which was laid on the table, which is germane to the consideration of the special committee that has been appointed by the Senate, and of which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] is chairman. I move that that bill be taken from the table and referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 3) more effectually to suppress the rebellion was taken from the table, and referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

FREEDMAN'S VILLAGE.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the select committee on slavery and freedmen be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into and report upon, as soon hereafter as practicable, the condition, food, lodging, treatment, and shelter of the freedmen now located at Freedman's Village, so called, near Arlington Heights, Virginia, under the protection of the Government, and whether any abuses exist in the management of affairs pertaining to their health and comfort, and if so, what legislation is necessary to correct the same.

NAVAL ADVISORY BOARD.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the Senate the report and proceedings of the advisory board, appointed under the act of July 16, 1862, entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grades of line officers of the United States Navy," together with the instructions to said advisory board, and all letters, memorials, and other papers on file in the Department, protesting against or in any manner relating to the action of said advisory board, whether the same were written or presented by officers of the Navy not recommended for further promotion by said advisory board, or by other persons in their behalf.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. HOWE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the Senate what public books and documents are in his custody which by a joint resolution of Congress, approved March 3, 1863, were set apart for distribution.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to the resolution, though I believe that information has been particularly furnished in a printed sheet delivered to every Senator by the Secretary of the Interior within the last week. If the Senate choose to pass it, I have no objection; but I think the Secretary has made a full report upon the subject, covering the volumes, and stating the reason why he could not execute the joint resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

OATH OF OFFICE.

Mr. WILSON. I move to postpone all other subjects, and take up the bill to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair had forgotten that half past twelve o'clock of this day was assigned as the hour for the consideration, as a special order, of the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] proposing an additional rule of the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. That is now the special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That subject is now before the Senate, and is the special order.

Mr. SUMNER. At the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware, who is now in his place, I propose to move that that be again postponed until to-morrow at twelve and a half o'clock, and made the special order; and I make that motion on this account: the Senator, as we all know, is desirous of being heard on the question, and to-day seems to be set apart to finish the military bill, and if we enter upon the consideration of the military bill there may not be time for the Senator from Delaware to go through with his remarks. I therefore make the motion that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock, and made the special order for that hour.

Mr. BAYARD. I have not the slightest objection to the postponement of the resolution until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock, and making it the special order for that time. I am at the pleasure of the Senate as regards any discussion I am to make of the proposed rule. If the public business requires that other measures should be first disposed of, of course it is proper that it should be done, and I accede to it without a moment's hesitation. All I desire is that when the proposed rule comes up for consideration I may have time to be heard. It will take me some time to express my views in opposition to it. After that I shall take no further part in the debate, nor do I intend to vote on the question of the adoption or rejection of the rule, because, though I hold that I have the right to do so, I should consider it neither proper nor decorous to cast my vote on a question which might decisively affect my own personal action; and even if that vote should reject the rule, it will not be given.

Under these circumstances I simply ask to be heard, and when I am heard I would rather commence at such an hour that I may hope there will be a sufficient number of the Senate present to listen to the views that I have to express. I have, however, no objection to the postponement until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock, and making it the special order at that time.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to have the matter that concerns me personally disposed of by the Senate. I am not inclined to interfere with the arrangement suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts that seems to be desired by the Senator from Delaware. But while I avow my willingness thus to yield to the pleasure and disposition of the Senate in relation to these subjects, I hope that the Senate will make my matter the special order for Wednesday at one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to postpone this resolution until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock, and make it the special order at that time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am perfectly willing that it shall be taken up to-morrow, provided this enrollment bill be disposed of.

Mr. WILSON. I think we can finish that bill to-day in a short time.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED EXPULSION OF MR. DAVIS.

Mr. DAVIS. I move now that the resolution for my expulsion be made the special order, I will say for Thursday next, so that I may not interfere with the pending bill, or with the matter that relates personally to the Senator from Delaware.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky moves to proceed to the consideration of the resolution for his expulsion.

Mr. DAVIS. With a view to postpone it.

The motion to take up the resolution was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is now before the Senate, and the Senator moves to postpone it until Thursday at one o'clock, and make it the special order for that hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky and to the members of the Senate whether it is not better to refer the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] at once to the Judiciary Committee, and thus make a step in advance in that matter; and if it is agreeable to the Senator from Kentucky, as he has been heard at some length on the subject, I will submit the motion that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with a view to obtain a report from that committee before any further action shall be had.

Mr. DAVIS. I have not the slightest objection to the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio. I would as soon the matter should take that course as any other. All I desire is that the Senate at an early and convenient day shall take action upon the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. That course will probably expedite the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is understood to make a motion to commit.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky withdraws his motion to postpone.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not wish to oppose this motion to refer if it is the sense of the Senate that the subject should be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary; but I confess that I do not see that there is any question of law involved which, according to the usage and practice of the Senate, would require any preliminary action by that committee. There is no doubt about the facts of the case. But at the suggestion of Senators around me, I make no opposition to the motion.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope, Mr. President, this resolution will not be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I cannot perceive what beneficial results can flow from such a reference. I cannot perceive what light the Committee on the Judiciary can throw upon it. The Senator from Kentucky is charged with having introduced into the Senate a series of resolutions containing, among other things, the expression which is the foundation of the motion to expel him. I do not understand what new light it is possible for the Judiciary Committee to throw upon that expression or upon any other portion of the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky than such as may be contained on the face of the paper itself. If I thought that any extraneous facts could be procured which would throw any light on the subject, either in favor of the Senator from Kentucky or against him, I certainly would not object to the reference; but the whole thing is embodied in the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky. For whatever reason the Senate may see fit to pass the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts for his expulsion, that reason is found in the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky themselves, and no extraneous facts, so far as I can perceive, can be of any weight or influence in the investigation, or in the discussion of the subject before the Senate. It seems to me, therefore, that such a reference would be entirely nugatory, and unproductive of any beneficial result, and hence I hope the resolution will not be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Every Senator must judge for himself as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the accusation brought against the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I do not desire that there should be any reference of the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I do not see any propriety in, or any good result that can flow from, its reference. I have no objection, however, to that course being taken; I have no objection to any course that it is the pleasure of the Senate to take in relation to the matter. All that I desire is to have reasonably prompt action by the Senate upon the subject. For my own part I would prefer that the matter should be acted upon by the Senate without a reference; but any course which the Senate deems it proper to take on the subject of the resolution, so as to insure a reasonably speedy action upon it, will be satisfactory to me, if my pleasure is to be consulted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not see any object in committing this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, unless it is the desire of the Senate to get rid of it. There is nothing in the world for the committee to investigate. The Senator from Kentucky has offered certain resolutions in the Senate. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to expel him from the Senate on account of matter contained in those resolutions. Now, what is there for the committee to investigate? As has been very properly remarked by the Senator from Michigan, every Senator will judge upon his own responsibility whether he is to vote for the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts or not. There can certainly be no inquiry to be made by the committee.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know about that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Vermont intimates that there may be. I do not know what it can be. I do not know how we are going to enlighten the Senator from Vermont or anybody else by taking the resolution down to the committee room and reading it over there. What report are we to make?

Mr. COLLAMER. You will find out all about that. The Senate have great confidence in your committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It really looks to me more like shuffling the resolution out of the Senate than anything else.

Mr. COLLAMER. You will bring it back again.

The motion to refer was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 24, nays 15.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now move that the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky be referred to the same committee. They involve a great many constitutional questions.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

On the motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading. It is, however, still open to amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I think there is a necessity for a slight amendment in section four after the word "draft" in the eighth line. I move to amend by inserting the words "not exceeding three years."

Mr. WILSON. That makes it conform.

Mr. CLARK. It makes it conform to another section, and I believe there is no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is suggested to me by a Senator more conversant than myself with the construction of statutes, that the fifth section, which was amended on my motion by inserting the proviso at the end of the section, would read better if the substance of the proviso was embodied in that part of the section to which it applies. I therefore move to strike out the proviso, and to insert after the word "calls," in the eleventh line, the following words:

But not until the present enrollment shall be exhausted, and this exemption shall not exceed the term for which such person shall have been drafted.

It is the same thing, except that this language is put in a different part of the section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator proposes a mere transposition of a sentence. That change will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. When the bill was in Committee of the Whole, I voted against the amendment to place ministers of religion in the class of non-combatants, because I thought it had better not be in the section where it was, with the provision exempting persons conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms.

Mr. SUMNER. What section is that?

Mr. ANTHONY. Section nineteen. I will now offer the following amendment as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That all persons recognized as ministers of religion by the ecclesiastical authority of the denomination or communion to which they belong, and who have actually been ordained as such, when called into the military service under the provisions of this act, shall be considered non-combatants, and shall be employed as chaplains or in hospitals.

Mr. SHERMAN. Since we have retained the commutation clause, there is no good reason for allowing ministers of the gospel to be exempted from duty. I have received a letter from the bishop of Ohio, who is very much in favor of exempting clergymen, but, he says, since the commutation clause is retained—it makes no difference as to the amount—he believes the clergy are perfectly willing to pay their commutation if their religious scruples or their religious duties will not allow them to go into the field. I therefore see no occasion for putting ministers of the gospel on the list of non-combatants. They, themselves, do not claim to be non-combatants, and I do not think they ask this privilege since we have retained the commutation clause. I shall therefore vote against any such exemption.

Mr. HARLAN. And in addition to the reason suggested by the Senator from Ohio, I will remark that this amendment, if it should be adopted, carries with it a disability. It provides that these parties shall be regarded as non-combatants and put to service in the hospitals. In point of fact, there are many men recognized by the religious societies with whom they worship as ministers, who are serving in high positions in the Army. I know of one who arranged the order of battle at the last great battle fought near the capital, the battle at Gettysburg, an ordained minister in good standing in the church of which he is a member. Such a man might be drafted, and the Governor of the State might desire to appoint him to the position of corporal, or lieutenant, or captain, or colonel, and the President of the United States might desire to advance him to a higher position—

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator will allow me, I will remove that objection by substituting the word "may" for "shall."

Mr. HARLAN. I do not think that will remove the difficulty. That will be a question, however, for lawyers to settle.

Mr. President, there is no good reason why an able-bodied man, who is an ordained minister, should be compelled to serve in a menial capacity any more than gentlemen who are licensed to practice law or those who are licensed to practice medicine. They do not request it themselves, and we ought not to impose on them such a disability.

Then, again, this amendment provides that they may serve as chaplains. This is a bad way, as it seems to me, to select chaplains, to select them by lot. Why not select your commissaries or your quartermasters in the same way, and say if any dealer in provisions shall be drafted he shall be regarded as a non-combatant and shall serve as a commissary of subsistence? The law as it now stands places some guards around the selection of chaplains. It provides that they shall be recommended by the denomination of which they are members, or by at least five ordained ministers of the denomination with which they worship. This amendment provides that they may be selected by lot. I think that in every respect the amendment is an improper one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer another amendment, to insert the following as new sections:

And be it further enacted, That any person drafted into the military service of the United States, who is conscientiously unable to perform military service, or pay commutation therefor, by reason of his religious scruples against bearing arms, may apply by petition to any judge of any court of the United States for the circuit or district wherein he resides, setting forth the facts; whereupon the said judge shall proceed summarily to hear and determine the case; and if it shall appear that such petition is true, and that such petitioner shall have maintained a consistent character in accordance with his well-known religious professions, incompatible with military service, the judge shall certify the fact to the board of enrollment for the enrollment district in which such petitioner shall reside, and upon the receipt of such certificate the board of enrollment shall take no further proceedings, nor shall any proceeding whatever be taken to enforce such conscientious person into the military service of the United States under that draft, or for the period of three years from the date of such certificate.

And be it further enacted, That at the time of issuing such certificate by a judge of the district or circuit court, as aforesaid, or as soon thereafter as practicable, such judge shall issue an order to the clerk of the district or circuit court of which he is the judge, to issue a warrant of distress directed to the marshal of the district, or to his deputy, against such conscientious person for the sum of $400, with all lawful costs upon the said petition and warrant, and the same shall be served by levying the same upon the goods, chattels, moneys, lands, and tenements of such conscientious person, and when recovered, the said penalty shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and the costs to the persons entitled to receive the same.

The effect of this amendment is, that a person conscientiously scrupulous against bearing arms is relieved from the obligation to pay $400 for the procurement of some other person to do that which he believes God has forbidden him to do, and provides that the fine shall be collected by warrant of distress. He then submits to the law, the law takes his property, and he makes no complaint or opposition; but he is not required to do it voluntarily, and that is a great relief to the consciences of a great many intelligent men. I do not see how it makes any sort of difference to the Government. I hope the amendment will meet with the assent of the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The bill as it stands does not require them to go as combatants at all, but simply gives them their choice, either to take care of the sick and wounded, or pay over their $400 for the purpose of providing for the wants of the sick and wounded. I do not understand any Quaker in the world to object to ministering to the wants of those who are sick or who are wounded in war. They are willing to do everything to alleviate the results of war. What they object to is bearing arms and being instrumental in the killing of men themselves.

Mr. ANTHONY. A great many of them object to rendering any service which relieves another man from the obligation of that service and enables him to go into the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is going too far.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is going too far, I know, but it is no further than very honest and very intelligent men go. They have held these opinions, and their ancestors before them, for a great many years. As it is the same thing to the Government, and will be a material relief to them, I cannot see any objection to the amendment. I am not going to debate the matter.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know of the Senator from Rhode Island whether he feels assured that the Quakers would rather have this tax which he is going to impose upon them than go to the war? They have generally an aversion to going into court; but this amendment compels them to go into court. The thing is utterly impracticable. They have got to make this application before the judge of the district or circuit court of the district in which they live. That may possibly be done in the State of Rhode Island, where there are only two or three counties, and those very small ones; but what would a man do in a State the size of the one of which I am a citizen, containing ninety-nine counties? The Quakers would be carried off from one portion of the State and placed in the Army before they would have an opportunity to reach or to convey any kind of intelligence to the district judge in that district. If we were to adopt the proposition it could not be carried into execution; it is utterly impracticable. It might possibly be executed in some States, but it would be impossible to execute it in others.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, I think these persons ought either to be exempted altogether or not exempted at all. I have on my table a memorial placed there this morning, which comes from the meeting representing the Ohio Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at Damascus on the 8th day of the first month, 1864, in which these memorialists state—

"That the Society of Friends has from its rise been conscientious against fighting or bearing arms under any circumstances, or paying an equivalent in lieu thereof."

After stating the grounds of their belief, the memorial winds up by saying:

"We therefore respectfully ask for exemption from military service, and from all penalties for the non-performance thereof."

This memorial embodies the idea which I have always understood to be entertained by Friends, that they cannot in any way take part in war according to their conscientious convictions. I voted against their exemption the other day. I do not see, myself, why they should be exempt. It is a very harsh measure, I know; but it is a very harsh measure to force other men into the Army, if their disposition is not to go there, and if their patriotic feelings do not offer them a sufficient inducement to volunteer. I do not think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island reaches the point desired by the Friends. We should do either one thing or the other: exempt them altogether or not at all.

Mr. SUMNER. I will inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island whether his amendment is confined in its operation exclusively to persons belonging to the Society of Friends?

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, no; all persons conscientiously scrupulous against bearing arms.

Mr. SUMNER. It is applicable, then, not merely to Friends, but to all persons who have conscientious scruples against bearing arms.

Mr. ANTHONY. And who can prove that their lives and conversation have been in accordance with their profession.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the proposition of the Senator ought to be adopted. I felt that the proposition we acted on the other day was defective, especially in that part of it introduced by my friend the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN,] where he restrained its operation not only to persons who were conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms, but they must also be prohibited from doing so by the rules and articles of faith and practice of their religious denomination. That of course gives no exemption to an individual conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms. Now it so happens, since I have come into the Senate to-day I have received from the Governor of my State a communication covering one addressed to him relating to a soldier in our service who is conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms, and the Governor in his communication to me especially asks me to interest myself in this case and to present it to the Government; but I will now present it to the Senate as an illustration of the hardship which occurs under our existing law:

"The following facts in relation to the young man we have from such authority as leaves us no doubt of their substantial correctness. He has from boyhood been a non-resistant, and regarded all war as criminal, and has entirely abstained from voting as a religious duty. Since then he has done everything in his power to aid the Government against the assaults of the slaveholders. Drafted in October last, the authorities of the camp on Long Island appreciated his religious scruples against bearing arms, and treated him with kindness and respect. But in Virginia the officer in charge, a Major Cook, of Gloucester, Massachusetts—

I am sorry I am obliged to read such a statement with reference to a Massachusetts officer—"has endeavored to force him to yield his conscientious convictions. He has been tied up in the woods with mules, suspended by his hands after the manner of slaves, until he could hardly stand alone, deprived of shelter, food, and finally put in the guard-house, where he has been for six or seven weeks. All this the soldier has borne with great courage and patience. His health is seriously impaired by such exposure and severity."

"You have already generously discharged several Quakers who have been drafted into the Army. This leads us to hope that you will not hesitate to discharge from military service this young man who is suffering from his adherence to the same principles as theirs."

This is signed by four respectable and, I may say, eminent citizens of Massachusetts, and is addressed to the Secretary of War. I quote it simply as an illustration of the hardship that occurs under our existing law. I hope, therefore, that the proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question on the amendment, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. WADE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWELL. I move to amend the bill by inserting as a new section the following:

And be it further enacted, That ministers of the gospel who have no secular pursuit and who have not an estate the income of which is sufficient to support themselves and families, and who devote themselves exclusively to the ministry, are exempt from military service under this act.

It is not my purpose to make an elaborate argument on the amendment I propose. There is now a section in the bill exempting from military service those who are conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms. The amendment I offer only exempts such ministers of the gospel as devote themselves exclusively to the ministry, and who have no other means of support. I do think those persons ought not to be compelled to go into the Army. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will read an extract, only a few lines, from the letter I referred to, from the bishop of the diocese of Ohio:

"If the result of the present legislative debate shall be the retention of the $300 commutation, there will be entire satisfaction as to the clergy. They have no disposition—I speak of our own—to avoid a reasonable share of burden. What they seek is to be allowed in the discharge of that burden to discharge also their sacred functions."

Then he says there will be no difficulty in clergymen, where they are popular with the people, obtaining commutation money and thus discharging themselves of this service.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 5, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Dixon, Powell, Sumner, and Willey—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wilson, and Wright—33.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. If it be in order, I wish to offer an amendment to the fifteenth section. That section provides—

That any person who shall forcibly resist or oppose any enrollment, or who shall incite, counsel, encourage, or who shall conspire or confederate with any other person or persons forcibly to resist or oppose any such enrollment, or who shall aid or assist, or take any part in any forcible resistance or opposition thereto, or who shall assault, obstruct, hinder, impede, or threaten any officer or other person employed in making or in aiding to make such enrollment, or employed in the performance, or in aiding in the performance of any service in any way relating thereto, or in arresting or aiding to arrest any spy or deserter from the military service of the United States shall, upon conviction thereof in any court competent to try the offense, be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or by both of said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

This clause simply punishes by fine and imprisonment conspiracies and other efforts to obstruct the enrollment and drafting of men, and also for assaulting, obstructing, hindering, or impeding their enrollment or the draft; but it omits entirely to impose any penalty in cases where such obstruction or hindering or impeding results in the death of the officer or other person in the public employment in carrying out the draft. I think, sir, we have full authority to punish any crime that may be committed in opposition to this bill when it shall become a law, and therefore that we have the power and the right to punish murder which may be committed in resisting the execution of this law; and the object of my amendment is to punish, as for the crime of murder, the offender in every case in which his assault or his obstruction or hindering or impeding shall result in the death of the officer or person employed in the public service. I therefore offer this amendment to come in at the end of the section:

And in cases where such assaulting, obstructing, hindering, or impeding shall produce the death of such officer or other person, the offender shall be deemed guilty of murder, and upon conviction thereof upon indictment in the circuit or district court of the United States for the district within which the offense was committed, shall be punished with death.

Mr. COWAN. That amendment is the law now unquestionably, in my judgment. I think the killing of any one in the execution of a lawful act is now, always was, and always will be murder. We have formerly made resisting the draft an offense, and if persons, in resisting the draft, killed the officer attempting to execute it, that would have been murder, and would have been punishable under any State law. We have now amended the law, because the question arose in my own State, and it was held there by the United States courts that resisting the enrollment was not an offense, because it was not made so specifically by the act of 1863. We have amended that, however, and now we have made it unlawful to resist the enrollment; and if a killing should take place by one resisting the enrollment, that killing would be murder, unquestionably, I take it, and would be punished as such, under our State laws at least.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Pennsylvania is undoubtedly right; it would be murder, but it would not be an offense cognizable in the United States courts. It would be murder, I doubt not, under the laws of all the States; but is it best that it should be left there? The object of this amendment is to give the United States courts jurisdiction of the higher offense as well as the lesser one. The bill already provides that if a person resists an officer in the execution of this law he may be punished by fine and imprisonment in the United States courts. Suppose the resistance is such that it occasions the death of the officer, as has been the case in some instances. Opposition has been made to the execution of this law in some cases which has resulted in the death of the officer, and it has occurred in localities where no fair trial can be had in the State court. It is in those very localities where the resistance is to be found. There are counties where you could not get an impartial jury to try the offender under the State law. Is it not appropriate and proper that a man who resists an officer of the United States in the discharge of his duty and kills him in that resistance should be tried before the tribunals of the United States, where you may get a jury from the State at large? It seems to me most appropriate and proper that the United States courts should have jurisdiction of such a case, but I am not aware of any law, and I think the Senator from Pennsylvania will not be able to find any statute of the United States, that provides for such a case. Unquestionably the offender would be liable to indictment and trial and punishment under the State law in the absence of any law of the United States on the subject. Hence I think there is a necessity for such a provision as that introduced by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COWAN. I do not know that I have any particular objection to the amendment. As the Senator supposes that a new remedy will be offered by it for such an offense as this, certainly I shall not resist it. I am satisfied, however, there is ample remedy now in the State laws. There might be a conflict of jurisdiction by transferring the remedy to the United States courts. The States might claim it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me ask the Senator, how could there be a conflict of jurisdiction on the higher offense more than on the lesser one? You now provide punishment by imprisonment in the penitentiary and by fine for resisting an officer where death does not ensue.

Mr. COWAN. Because in the lesser one it is not an offense by the State law. That is properly cognizable in the United States courts. I am not afraid that the man guilty of murder while in the execution of an unlawful act will ever be unable to get a fair trial in a State where you can make a draft at all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Surely my friend from Pennsylvania does not mean to say that assaulting a person is not an offense by State law. This bill provides already for punishing the person who assaults another. That surely is an offense by the State law.

Mr. COWAN. Unquestionably.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well. Then we have already provided in the bill to punish those offenses, which would be offenses under the State law, of a lesser grade than murder.

Mr. COWAN. I mean to say that assaulting a person for resisting the enrollment under the law of March 3, 1863, was not an offense against the United States although it was an offense against the State law, and State laws punished that offense when the courts of the United States had no jurisdiction over it and could afford no remedy.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the offense created by the amendment I have offered is this: in order to constitute it there must be forcible resistance and obstruction to the officer executing the conscription law, and that forcible obstruction or resistance on the part of the offender must produce or result in the death of the officer or other person employed in the execution of the statute. This offense is declared in the amendment to be murder, and is made punishable by death.

It is undoubtedly very true, as the Senator from Pennsylvania says, that in all the States murder is punishable. But the Senator certainly cannot be ignorant of the fact that the law of murder is different in different States. For instance, the rule relating to and defining the crime of murder may be one thing in New York and a different thing in Kentucky. In the State of New York the crime of murder is divided into various degrees, and the punishment apportioned according to the degrees of guilt prescribed in the statute. In other States—I do not know how many others, but probably some—murder is treated the same as it was at the common law; but the punishment is meted out as the Legislature may see fit. The kinds of punishment in different States are also different. In some of the States murder is punished by death; in others it is punished by imprisonment at hard labor, or without hard labor, in the penitentiary. In some it is punished by death, but only upon the warrant of the Governor of the State, and cannot take place until the Governor shall award his warrant to the sheriff of the county. This is the case in the State of Vermont, if I recollect aright. So that there is no uniformity either in the description of the offense in the several States, nor is there any uniformity in the kind or description of punishment inflicted upon it. One great object of this amendment is to produce this uniformity of punishment throughout the United States, and not to permit a person who has been guilty in the State of Vermont or New York, where capital punishment may not exist, to go without punishment, to preserve his life, and finally, perhaps, by a pardon be liberated entirely, while at the same time we punish with death another person in the State of Kentucky or Maryland, should the penalty of death exist there.

The great object of this amendment is to render the crime certain and well defined throughout the United States, and to inflict the same punishment in every case. Now, sir, there can be no conflict between the Federal jurisdiction and the State jurisdiction in the trial of cases which may arise under this amendment. It is undoubtedly true that a homicide committed in resisting an officer under this law in Pennsylvania could be punished there as murder, and the offender subjected to be indicted and tried there, and punished according to the laws of the State. There is no doubt of this; but still there is a propriety, a consistency, and a harmony in the idea of the Government of the United States taking into its own hands and punishing according to its own wishes this high offense against the law and against the peace of society.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Michigan whether he ought not to amend his proposition by striking out the words "district or," so as to confine the trial to the circuit courts of the United States. I believe that in all cases under the laws of the United States where the death penalty is prescribed the indictment can be found only in the circuit court of the United States, for the reason which has always governed Congress, that if a man be tried for his life he ought to be tried in a court where there are two judges, so that if upon a doubtful question of law there should be a division of opinion between the judges the Supreme Court of the United States might have jurisdiction. Otherwise, if he is tried in the district court, the verdict and judgment are final upon him; he has no remedy, no appeal. I do not wish to be understood as agreeing that we can confer jurisdiction upon the United States courts of the crime of murder in the States, but if we attempt to do it, I suggest that it ought only to be tried in the circuit court of the United States, in analogy to all our existing laws in regard to the trial of capital cases.

Mr. HOWARD. The amendment provides that the offense may be tried either in the district court or in the circuit court of the district within which the offense is committed. I am quite aware, as I understand the Senator from Indiana to suggest, that it is the right of the accused in almost all of the States to bring a bill of exceptions from the court in which he is tried into a higher court, for the purpose of having any question of law decided that may have arisen in the course of the trial. This is, however, a purely legislative right which he possesses; it does not exist at the common law, as the Senator undoubtedly quite well knows. Whether it would be best to give the offender the right to take a bill of exceptions and take the case from the district court to the circuit court, must be determined by the Senate. I confess I do not see any necessity for it myself. It is a privilege, certainly, which the accused enjoys in several of the State courts; but whether it exists in all of them I am not prepared to say. It does in my own State, I know; it does probably in the State represented by the Senator from Indiana; but for the purposes of carrying out this conscription act, and of making the punishment certain and effectual, it seems to me that we may very well dispense with the right of appeal or the right to a bill of exceptions.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator does not accept the suggestion which I made, I will move an amendment—

Mr. HOWARD. I did not hear the Senator very distinctly, and perhaps I did not apprehend him correctly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "district or," so that the indictment can only be found in the circuit court of the United States, in which court there are two judges.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not necessarily. The district judge holds the circuit court in the absence of the supreme judge. That has been the case in Illinois for ten years past until very recently; the supreme judge has not been present, I venture to say, a quarter of the term. Judge McLean very seldom attended at all; I think not for ten years at Springfield.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am aware of the truth of what the Senator says; but the circuit judge cannot sit in the district court. If the party be indicted in the district court he cannot have two judges to preside at his trial. If he be indicted in the circuit court he may have the benefit of two judges.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to inquire of the Senator whether all he desires is that the trial should take place in the circuit court, and not in the district court.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir; that is my proposition.

Mr. HOWARD. I have not the slightest objection to that; and I will accept a modification to that effect, so as to confine the jurisdiction to the circuit court. I did not understand the Senator at first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan modifies his own amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let it be read as it now stands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves to insert at the end of the fifteenth section the words which will now be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

And in cases where such assaulting, obstructing, hindering, or impeding shall produce the death of such officer or other person, the offender shall be deemed guilty of murder, and, upon conviction thereof upon indictment in the circuit court of the United States for the district within which the offense was committed, shall be punished with death.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest to my honorable friend from Michigan that instead of using the term "murder" he use the term "high crime and misdemeanor." The punishment is the same; the object is the same; but as it now stands a question may be raised which may perhaps be troublesome.

Mr. HOWARD. I should rather prefer the ancient word "murder."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I also move a further amendment to that same section. I move to strike out in line fourteen of the section the word "hundred," and to insert "thousand" instead of it; and in line fifteen to strike out the word "two," and insert "five," so that the clause will read: "be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both." The amendment increases the term of imprisonment of the offender and the amount of the fine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read three several times, the question now is, shall it pass?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 17.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to suggest an amendment, which of course cannot be introduced now without the unanimous consent of the Senate, which pertains to the phraseology of a clause in the sixth section. Commencing after the word "United States" in the thirteenth line, I wish to strike out the words "shall be credited upon the quota of the State within which they are enlisted, and not," and in lieu of those words to insert "in any State shall not be credited," so that the clause shall read: "that colored troops enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States in any State shall not be credited upon the quota of any other State."

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the Senator from Iowa if his proposed amendment changes in his view the meaning of the section as it stands.

Mr. HARLAN. I think not, except that it would not require us to give credit to South Carolina for troops that might be enlisted in that State, where no draft can possibly be enforced.

Mr. JOHNSON. I see no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment can be received at this stage of proceedings only by the unanimous consent of the Senate. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The amendment is before the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, resulted—yeas 30, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Grimes, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Saulsbury, Wilkinson, and Wright—10.

So the bill was passed.

GENERALS HOOKER, MEADE, AND HOWARD.

Mr. WILSON. There are resolutions on the table thanking some of the military men, that we may as well act upon at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator indicate what resolution he desires to call up?

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the joint resolution No. 3.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. No. 3) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Joseph Hooker and Major General George G. Meade, and the officers and soldiers of the army of the Potomac, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to insert after the name of General Meade the name of Major General Oliver O. Howard. As I have read the history of that campaign, the man who selected the position where the battle of Gettysburg was fought, and who, indeed, fought it the first day, was General Howard, and to him the country is indebted as much for the credit of securing that victory as to any other person. I wish, therefore, as a recognition of his merits, to couple his name with that of General Meade in the vote of thanks.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Before the vote is taken on the passage of the resolution, I should like to have it read in its present form.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the gratitude of the American people and the thanks of their representatives in Congress are due, and are hereby tendered, to Major General Joseph Hooker and the officers and soldiers of the army of the Potomac, for the skill, energy, and endurance which first covered Washington and Baltimore from the meditated blow of the advancing and powerful army of rebellion led by General Robert E. Lee; and to Major General George G. Meade, and Major General Oliver O. Howard, and the officers and soldiers of that army, for the skill and heroic valor which at Gettysburg repulsed, defeated, and drove back, broken and dispirited, beyond the Rappahannock, the veteran army of the rebellion.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I should like to vote a compliment to General Meade and his army as distinguished from other officers; but, as at present informed, in order to vote for a resolution of thanks to him, I am obliged to vote for a resolution that in some respects I do not like.

The resolution was passed.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the title be amended to correspond with the body of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to, and the title was amended to read: "A joint resolution expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Joseph Hooker, and Major General George G. Meade, and Major General Oliver O. Howard, and the officers and men of the army of the Potomac."

THANKS TO GENERAL BANKS.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the joint resolution expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Nathaniel P. Banks, and the officers and soldiers under his command at Port Hudson, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It tenders the thanks of Congress to Major General Nathaniel P. Banks and the officers and soldiers under his command, for the skill, courage, and endurance which compelled the surrender of Port Hudson, and thus removed the last obstruction to the free navigation of the Mississippi river.

The resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

THANKS TO GENERAL BURNSIDE.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the joint resolution of thanks to Major General Ambrose E. Burnside, and the officers and men who fought under his command, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It presents the thanks of Congress to Major General Ambrose E. Burnside, and through him to the officers and men who have fought under his command, for their gallantry, good conduct, and soldierlike endurance, and requests the President of the United States to cause the resolution to be communicated to Major General Burnside in such terms as he may deem best calculated to give effect thereto.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time, and passed.

CORNELIUS VANDERBILT.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, the joint resolution presenting the thanks of Congress to Cornelius Vanderbilt for a gift of the steamship Vanderbilt was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It recites that Cornelius Vanderbilt, of New York, did, during the spring of 1862, make a free gift to his imperiled country of his new and staunch steamship Vanderbilt, of five thousand tons burden, built by him with the greatest care, of the best material, at a cost of $800,000, which steamship has ever since been actively employed in the service of the Republic against the rebel devastations of her commerce; and that he has in no manner sought any requital of this magnificent gift, nor any official recognition thereof. It is therefore proposed that the thanks of the American people be presented by Congress to Commodore Vanderbilt for this unique manifestation of a fervid and large-souled patriotism. The President of the United States is to cause a gold medal to be struck, which shall fitly embody an attestation of the nation's gratitude for this gift; which medal shall be forwarded to Commodore Vanderbilt, a copy of it being made and deposited for preservation in the Library of Congress.

Mr. HALE. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator from New York who has moved that this resolution be taken up and considered, if he has found or knows of any precedent in the history of the country analogous to this which would justify Congress in taking such a measure.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know, Mr. President, that there is any precedent for so large a gift as that which was made by Cornelius Vanderbilt to the Government of the United States. I cannot answer the Senator's question in relation to a precedent for this vote of thanks, because I have not looked to that subject; but I know that the President of the United States sent a message to Congress on the 17th of July, 1862, in regard to this gift of Mr. Vanderbilt, which, with the permission of the Senate, I will read:

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have inadvertently omitted so long to inform you that in March last Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, of New York, gratuitously presented to the United States the ocean steamer Vanderbilt, by many esteemed the finest merchant ship in the world. She has ever since been and still is doing valuable service to the Government. For the patriotic interest in making this magnificent and valuable present to the country, I recommend that some suitable acknowledgment be made.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

July 17, 1862.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire that the word "commodore" where it occurs in the resolution be erased, and the word "Cornelius" inserted. Mr. Vanderbilt is not a commodore, and never was. It is a sort of nickname, and I think we had better not use it, but use the man's correct name, as it is used in the message of the President. I move to strike out "commodore" where it occurs, and insert "Cornelius."

Mr. MORGAN. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not competent for the Senator from New York to accept an amendment to a joint resolution; but the amendment will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HALE. Some time last year I think it was, certainly during the last Congress, my attention and that of the Naval Committee was especially directed to this general question. Some fifty or sixty recommendations for votes of thanks were referred to that committee by the Senate, and we had occasion to examine into the history of that matter. I got our accommodating and accomplished secretary, General Hickey, to ransack the files of the Government for me to find how many times the thanks of Congress had been presented from the beginning of the Government up to the last Congress. I do not remember precisely how many he found, but they were very few indeed; I think not exceeding seven from the commencement of the Government up to the time of the last Congress; and they had been conferred, I think, upon General Washington, General Jackson, General Scott, and I do not know but General Macomb. There had been but very few cases; such votes were rare; and when they passed they meant something; they conferred a distinction and an honor. But, in my humble judgment, in an evil hour, and in the execution of an improper policy, Congress passed an act by which certain special privileges were to follow the conferring of the thanks of Congress upon an officer by name; and the minute that was done almost all the officers in the Navy and their friends were besieging the Executive—it had to be done upon the recommendation of the Executive—for a recommendation to Congress of a vote of thanks in order to open the way for them to promotion; and so, I think in a single message, we had a recommendation from the Executive that Congress confer a vote of thanks by name upon ten times as many officers, going down I think as low as lieutenants, as had ever received such a compliment before during the whole history of the Government.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator will remember that that recommendation came from the President to pass this vote of thanks to those officers before the grade bill passed which conferred any privilege upon the person who was thus thanked.

Mr. HOWARD. What was the privilege?

Mr. GRIMES. Promotion.

Mr. HALE. I do not know how that is.

Mr. GRIMES. That is a fact.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator is advised on that subject, of course I do not contradict him, though my impression was the other way; but it makes no odds; we had this batch of some fifty or sixty officers, going down to lieutenants, recommending that they be thanked by name; and there were a great many others—I do not know if there were not one hundred sent in during the last Congress, certainly somewhere between fifty and one hundred.

The Naval Committee, I think on the suggestion of my friend from Iowa, came to the conclusion that they would adopt a certain rule which should govern them; and that was that they would not recommend Congress to confer a vote of thanks by name on any officer unless he was in the separate command of a squadron or an expedition or something of that sort; and in pursuance of that recommendation of the committee to the Senate, the Senate actually refused a vote of thanks to some very worthy and deserving officers because they did not come within that rule. My own impression, as I said before, is that Congress were exceedingly unwise in adopting the provision to which I have alluded, and that this matter of conferring thanks has been carried to such an extent, and if persisted in by Congress will be carried to such an extent, that not only will a vote of thanks be of no worth to the officer to whom it is tendered, but it will deteriorate from the value of those which have been passed heretofore in favor of such men as Washington and Jackson and Scott.

I believe this is an entirely new precedent, though I do not speak advisedly upon that subject, for I have not examined the record recently. I did examine it very carefully during the last Congress. I think it will be an entirely new precedent to pass a vote of thanks to an individual for a gift of this sort. I have no objection, if Congress deem it wise, that such a fitting acknowledgment of this munificence of Mr. Vanderbilt as is necessary should be made; but I do object that the gift of a very wealthy man—he must have been wealthy or he could not afford to do it—to the Government of a ship should be placed on the same footing with those high and heroic acts by which illustrious men have exposed their lives, and on the battle-field, at the peril of everything, vindicated the honor and defended the interests of the country. I think, sir, there should be in the public mind and in the councils of Congress a wide space between that spontaneous tribute of gratitude and affection which the people pay to those who, by deeds of heroism on the battle-field at the risk of their lives, have vindicated the honor of the country, and those who, however deserving, have simply made such a present as this to the Government.

I wish the honorable Senator from New York would consent to have this resolution lie over for a few days that we may have time to examine it. As it is, while I have the highest respect for Mr. Vanderbilt and appreciate the gift of his ship to the Government—though I believe if there was to be an account-current struck with him it would appear that we have not made a great deal out of Mr. Vanderbilt even crediting him with the full value of this ship—I think it is not a case for the distinguished honor which this resolution proposes to be conferred upon him.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry, Mr. President, that there is a suggestion to postpone the action of the Senate upon this resolution. The person who is most immediately concerned in regard to it has not asked any recognition of this gift by the Government; and it seems to me exceedingly ungracious to accept a gift of this description and then hingle upon the question of whether or not we will thank the donor for it, whether we will postpone our thanks to another day, and then perhaps refuse to offer them.

Mr. President, I am in nowise afraid that passing a vote of thanks to Mr. Vanderbilt for this gift will at all detract from the value of a vote of thanks passed to the illustrious men of the Republic who have rendered important services in the cabinet or in the field. There will be no danger that Congress will confound the one with the other, or that the people will confound such services with the most munificent gift of property. And if there were danger, what then? Is it a reason why we should not recognize in this way a service of this description? Sir, it was a most munificent gift. If it be asked whether there be any precedent for thanking any individual who has made a munificent gift to the country, and the answer be no, I apprehend it is also true that there has never been, either to this Government or to any other, a gift so munificent as this was by an individual; and it seems to me that the least we can do is to pass the vote which the resolution proposes. It is, as I think, simply just to Mr. Vanderbilt that it should be done to recognize so munificent a gift at a time when the country was in peril, great peril, and when this species of property was most of all desired by us, and when we cannot probably to-day produce another ship of equal value for $1,000,000. I hope, sir, that the resolution will pass, and that there will be no disposition to postpone it, or indeed to refuse it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it is a very ungracious thing to oppose a vote of thanks under any circumstances. The presentation of the thanks of Congress has become so frequent of late that I do not know whether its value has not been decreased thereby. But, sir, we are told in a certain old book, now out of use—whose precepts, at least, are not much regarded at the present day—that there was a time when people brought their offerings to the altar; the rich brought their costly offerings, and the poor brought theirs, and among the rest a poor widow cast in her mite. That old-fashioned book says that she gave more than those who presented their costly offerings. According to that standard, there are tens of thousands who have given more to the country than Commodore Vanderbilt. I think, therefore, that a general form of thanks, thanking everybody who does anything for the country, would reach the necessities of the hour, and would prevent the repetition of these constant votes of thanks.

Mr. MORGAN. To meet what I understand to be the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware, I move, in the first line of the resolution, to strike out the words "of the American people be presented by," and to insert after "Congress," in the second line, the words "be presented;" so that the resolution shall read, "that the thanks of Congress be presented to Cornelius Vanderbilt."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. There are some important matters that I think ought to be disposed of speedily, and we ought to have an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, January 18, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

PENNSYLVANIA MILITARY CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Second Auditor of the Treasury, in answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 13th instant, relative to vouchers for the expenses in calling out the Pennsylvania militia during the recent invasion of that State; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the call of committees for reports to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole and not to be brought back by motions to reconsider, and that, according to the usage since the rule had been established, no requests for unanimous consent could be entertained during the morning hour.

The SPEAKER then called the committees for reports, but none were presented that were admissible under the rule.

The SPEAKER then, as the next business in order, proceeded to call the States for resolutions, under which call bills on leave could be presented. The call commenced with the State of Pennsylvania, where it was suspended on Monday last.

LOAN OF THE HALL OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. KELLEY submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of the House of Representatives be granted to the United States Christian Commission on Monday evening, February 1, for their anniversary meeting.

Mr. COX. I desire to debate that resolution. I am opposed to granting the use of this Hall for any such purpose, especially after the exhibition we had here on Saturday night, when one half of this House was abused by a person I need not speak of.

The SPEAKER. The resolution, giving rise to debate, goes over.

CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

Mr. DAWSON submitted the following preamble and resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas a great civil war like that which now afflicts the United States is the most grievous of all national calamities, producing, as it does, spoliation, bloodshed, anarchy, public debt, official corruption, and private immorality, the American Government cannot rightfully wage such a war upon any portion of its people except for the sole purpose of vindicating the Constitution and laws and restoring both to their just supremacy; and whereas this House, on the 22d day of July, 1851, speaking in the name of the American people, in the face of the world, solemnly and truly declared that it was waged for no purpose of conquest or oppression, but solely to restore the Union with all the rights of the people and of the States unimpaired; and whereas in every war, especially in every war of invasion, and most particularly if it be a civil war between portions of the same country, the object of it ought to be clearly defined and the terms distinctly stated upon which hostilities will cease, and the advancing armies of the Government should carry the Constitution and laws in one hand while they hold the sword in the other, so that the invaded party may have its choice between the two: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be required to make known, by public proclamation or otherwise, to all the country that whenever any State now in insurrection shall submit herself to the authority of the Federal Government as defined in the Constitution, all hostilities against her shall cease, and such State shall be protected from all external interference with her local laws and institutions, and her people shall be guaranteed in the full enjoyment of all those rights which the Federal Constitution gave them.

Mr. STEVENS moved to lay the preamble and resolution upon the table.

Mr. DAWSON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

During the roll-call,

Mr. McINDOE stated that Mr. Cobb was absent in consequence of sickness.

Mr. ORTH stated that Mr. Dumont was absent by reason of sickness in his family.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, announced that Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, was absent on account of sickness.

Mr. ANCONA made a similar statement in regard to his colleague, Mr. JOHNSON.

Mr. BOYD made a like statement in reference to Mr. Blow.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were laid upon the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOAN OF THE HALL OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. MOORHEAD submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of the House of Representatives be granted to the United States Christian Commission on Tuesday evening, February 2, for their anniversary meeting.

Mr. COX. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. On what ground?

Mr. COX. I desire to debate it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the previous question. If the previous question should not be seconded, the gentleman from Ohio will be recognized.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MOORHEAD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DUTY ON PAPER.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to modify the existing law imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, as imposes an ad valorem duty of twenty per cent. upon printing paper, un-sized, used for books and newspapers exclusively.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEDALS FOR THE KANE EXPEDITION.

Mr. BROOMALL offered a resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of reporting such appropriation as may be necessary to procure the medals of honor awarded by Congress several years ago to the members of the Kane Arctic expedition.

EXEMPTION OF ACTING ASSISTANT SURGEONS.

Mr. STROUSE offered a resolution instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to report a bill so amending the act of March 3, 1863, for enrolling and calling out the national forces, as to exempt from draft or conscription all acting assistant surgeons in actual service in the Army or Navy of the United States, and moved the previous question on its adoption.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, is that resolution imperative, or is it one instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of the change?

The SPEAKER. It is imperative.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I move to modify it.

The SPEAKER. The motion for the previous question is pending, and a motion to amend is not in order.

Mr. STROUSE. I will modify the resolution so as to make it one of inquiry.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under its operation the resolution as modified was adopted.

EXEMPTION OF CLERGYMEN.

Mr. THAYER offered a resolution instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire and report to the House whether it would not be proper and expedient so to amend the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces as to exempt from the performance of military duties clergymen of all denominations actually engaged in the discharge of ministerial duties, and moved the previous question on its adoption.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND called for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the call for the yeas and nays will be withdrawn.

Mr. LE BLOND. I decline to withdraw the call. The vote will be regarded as showing the sentiment of the House on the subject.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the resolution will be withdrawn on the assurance given to the gentleman who offered it that the committee is at this time actually inquiring into the matter.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am willing this resolution shall pass; but I decline to be trotted out over the ayes and noes at the beck of any member of this House, and I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. COX. On that I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 46; as follows:

So the resolution was laid on the table.

ASSIGNMENT OF QUOTAS.

Mr. LAZEAR offered a resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of amending the act of March 3, 1863, for enrolling and calling out the national forces, so as to require that in assigning the quotas of troops hereafter to be raised by conscription, credit shall be given to States and counties for such of their citizens as may have enlisted in the military organizations of other States.

JOHN A. MCLOSKEY.

Mr. A. MYERS also introduced a bill for the relief of John A. McLoskey, deputy collector of the twentieth district of Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, and, with the petition on the subject, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

EVACUATION OF CUMBERLAND GAP.

Mr. COX. I beg leave to introduce the following resolution, and on its adoption to call for the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House copies of a communication from Brigadier General William Morgan to Adjutant General Thomas, dated Mount Vernon, Ohio, June 6, 1863, and the exhibits thereto attached, marked from A to 2 (two) inclusive, the same being in reply to that portion of the official report of Major General Halleck, dated December 2, 1862, relative to the evacuation of Cumberland Gap.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to that resolution.

The SPEAKER. Being a call on one of the Executive Departments for information it must, under the rules, lie over for one day.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. COX also introduced the following resolution, and on its adoption demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, urgently requested to appoint a board of commissioners who can by negotiation reach the authorities South with a view to the prompt exchange of our prisoners under the cartel heretofore agreed upon between the parties, and that the negotiation be withdrawn from the hands of Major General Butler, who, as it is reported, is unable, from causes connected with his past military conduct, to hold intercourse with those charged with this business in Richmond.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that that resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. COX. The Clerk has not read the whole of my resolution. The gentleman is too fast.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move, then, that the part which has been read be laid upon the table.

Mr. COX. Let the remaining portion of my resolution be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House all correspondence of the War Department, not already communicated, with reference to the exchange of prisoners.

The SPEAKER. If objected to, the latter resolution must lie over, under the rules.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the whole proposition be laid upon the table.

Mr. COX demanded the yeas and nays.

REBELLIOUS STATES.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to report from the select committee on the rebellious States a bill to guaranty certain States a republican form of government, and to have it ordered to be printed and made the special order for the first Tuesday of February, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. STILES. I object.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose I have indicated.

The motion was disagreed to, two thirds not voting in favor thereof; there being on a division—ayes 73, noes 56.

CONDUCT OF THE WAR, ETC.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs concurrent resolution of the Senate (No. 149) for the appointment of a joint committee on the conduct and expenditures of the present war, with an amendment.

Mr. PENDLETON. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose I have indicated.

The rules were suspended, two thirds voting in favor thereof; and the report was accordingly received.

The resolution of the Senate provides that a joint committee of three members of the Senate and four members of the House of Representatives be appointed to inquire into the conduct and expenditures of the present war; that they have power to send for persons and papers; to sit during the session of either House of Congress; and to employ a stenographer, at the usual rate of compensation.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:—

Strike out all after the word "war," and in lieu thereof insert the following:

And may further inquire into all the facts and circumstances of contracts and agreements already made, or that may be made, and such contracts and agreements hereafter to be made, prior to the final report of the committee, by or with any department of the Government, in anywise connected with or growing out of the operations of the Government in suppressing the rebellion against its constituted authority; and that the said committee shall have authority to sit during the sessions of either House of Congress, and during the recess of Congress, and at such times and places as said committee shall deem proper, and also employ a stenographer as clerk, at the usual rate of compensation. And be it further resolved, That the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House or of the Senate, as the said committee may direct, shall attend in person, or by assistant, the sittings of the said committee, and serve all subpoenas put into his hands by the committee, pay the fees of all witnesses, and the necessary and proper expenses of the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to let me move an amendment to further perfect the resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am willing to let the gentleman have a vote on his resolution, and when it is before the House I shall call for the previous question.

The amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was read, as follows:

And be it further resolved, That the Speaker of the House, or the Vice President and President of the Senate, shall be authorized to issue subpoenas to witnesses during the recess of Congress upon the request of the committee in the same manner as during the sessions of Congress, and said committee shall have authority to report in either branch of Congress at any time.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to the amendment of the committee,

Mr. COX demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the yeas and nays will be ordered, if gentlemen on the other side are opposed to investigation.

Mr. PENDLETON. We are not opposed to investigation.

Mr. COX. I appeal to gentlemen to allow us to amend this amendment so as to make the committee stationary. We do not want this roving commission running all summer. I also desire to move an amendment which shall provide that the committee report at this session of Congress.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no control over the matter, the House having ordered the main question to be put.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent. Objection was made.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order to move to suspend the rules for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules is already pending, and while that is so, another motion cannot be entertained.

Mr. COX. The object on this side of the House is to secure an investigation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Gentlemen on that side have been clamoring for an investigation, and now let us see whether they will vote for it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, James S. RIGHTS OF THE STATES.

Mr. HARDING introduced the following resolution, and upon it demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions, according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power upon which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon that I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The question recurred on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FENTON. Is it in order to move to refer the resolution to a committee?

The SPEAKER. Not pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FENTON. I hope the previous question will be voted down, and then I will move to refer the resolution to the select committee on the rebellious States.

Mr. STEVENS, (at twenty-five minutes to three o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion to enable me to offer a resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on the regular order of business.

Mr. DRIGGS. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion. I desire an opportunity of introducing a bill for reference.

Mr. EDGERTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the second section of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out of the national force, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, as to provide for the exemption from draft or military service under said act, without payment of commutation money or liability to procure substitutes, of all clergymen or ministers of religion in regular standing with their proper ecclesiastical authorities in any church or religious society who, by the law, or enactment of the existing civil war, are forbidden to shed human blood or to take human life in war, and for the like exemption of all other persons who have sincere religious convictions or scruples of conscience against taking part in war: Provided, That the facts upon which such exemption shall be claimed by any person shall be verified in such manner as the amendment may prescribe; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MISS DICKINSON'S LECTURE.

Mr. EDGERTON asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Whereas Miss Anna E. Dickinson, by a resolution of a majority of this House, was granted the use of this Hall of Representatives to deliver a public address entitled "Words for the Hour" on the evening of Saturday, 16th instant; and whereas said Anna E. Dickinson appeared upon a platform in this Hall on said evening, supported on her right by the Vice President of the United States, and on her left by the Speaker of this House, who thus by their presence and support gave, or appeared to give, a semi-official or governmental character and endorsement to said Miss Dickinson and her address, which address was a political rhapsody, breathing a spirit of intense partisanship for the present Administration, and denunciatory of its opponents, and was evidently designed to influence grave measures of legislation now before this House: Therefore,

Resolved, That we disapprove of the use of this Hall for the purpose to which it was applied on Saturday evening last, and of its future use for any similar purpose, as disrespectful and unjust to the minority of this House, and not in accordance with the purpose for which the Halls of the Federal Congress were designed and erected.

Mr. FARNSWORTH objected.

GENERALS NOT IN SERVICE.

Mr. HOLMAN submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Whereas this House has been officially informed that a large number of officers of the Army, including a number of major and brigadier generals, have been for a long period of time relieved from active service, while still receiving the full pay pertaining to their rank; and whereas such policy, while embarrassing to the officers so relieved, is manifestly unjust to the country, and interferes with just and proper promotions in the Army: Therefore,

Resolved, That, in the judgment of this House, the policy of retaining in the pay of the Government officers who have been indefinitely relieved from active service, not physically disabled by wounds, and who have not been placed on the retired list, ought to be discontinued, and that the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire what legislation, if any, is necessary to effect a remedy in the premises, and reduce the number of general officers not employed in active service; and report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the facts connected with the special details and absence from that Department of Dr. C. M. Wetherill, chemist of the Department of Agriculture; with power to send for persons and papers, and to report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. LOVEJOY. There is not even a charge made by the resolution. I do not think we should appoint such a committee without knowing something about the facts.

The question was taken on the adoption of the resolution, and the vote was announced—ayes 10, noes 55; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon the House (at four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned until tomorrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 19, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS PRESENTED.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the credentials of Hon. THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS, elected by the Legislature of Maryland to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. James Alfred Pearce. The credentials were read; the oaths prescribed by law were administered to Mr. HICKS, and he took his seat in the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a petition of assistant assessors under the direct tax and internal revenue laws, in the State of Illinois, praying for an increase of their compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARDING presented the memorial of Theodore J. Eckerson, military storekeeper in the ordnance department of the United States Army, praying that the military storekeepers of the ordnance department, being commissioned officers of the Army, shall have rank corresponding with the rank to which their pay is highest assimilated; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. COWAN presented eleven petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the increase of the pay of the non-commissioned officers and privates now in the service, or hereafter to be mustered into service as volunteers during the war; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Henry C. Whittier and other Massachusetts volunteers, who enlisted into the service of the United States for the term of nine months in the autumn of 1862, praying for a bounty of twenty-five dollars; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CONNESS presented a petition of citizens of Arizona Territory and of the southern counties of California, praying for the establishment of a mail route from San Bernardino, California, to La Paz, in the Territory of Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a memorial of the religious Society of Friends, of New York, praying for exemption from military service; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of Samuel Chase Barney, praying that inquiry may be made into the causes of his dismissal from the naval service; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the commissioner in relation to claims of Peruvian citizens, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 65) to provide for the payment of the claims of Peruvian citizens under the convention between the United States and Peru of the 12th of January, 1863. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred various petitions from inspectors of the customs, praying for an increase of their compensation, reported a bill (S. No. 66) to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. No. 11) of thanks to Major General George H. Thomas, and the officers and men who fought under his command at the battle of Chickamauga, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HICKS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. No. 19) of thanks of Congress to Commodore Cadwallader Ringgold, the officers and crew of the United States ship Sabine, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HALE. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 8) to encourage enlistments in the naval service of the United States, and to credit enlisted men to the military quotas of the respective States of which they are citizens, to report the same back with a recommendation that the bill be indefinitely postponed. The reason for the recommendation is that the essential provisions of this bill have been incorporated into the enrollment bill which has been passed by the Senate. I ask for the present consideration of the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill at the present time. The Chair hears no objection; and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. Its reading in detail will be dispensed with, if there be no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still open to amendment. No amendment being offered, the question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire that the further consideration of the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

INSANE PATIENTS.

Mr. GRIMES. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 49) relating to the admission of patients to the hospital for the insane in the District of Columbia, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, and to recommend its passage. If there be no other business with which it will interfere, as it is a very small matter, and it is very desirable the bill should pass at an early day, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider it at the present time.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, during the present war, to admit into the Government hospital for the insane such transient insane persons as may be found in the District of Columbia without the means of support, to be there detained until they can be sent to their friends or proper places of residence; the steps preliminary to their admission to be the same, except as to the affidavit of residence at the time they became insane, as are required in the case of indigent persons who became insane while residing in the District of Columbia.

The amendment was to insert after the word "residence," where it first occurred, the words, "under the direction of the said Secretary of the Interior, whose duty it shall be to provide therefor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

ISRAEL C. WAIT.

Mr. CLARK. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 34) in favor of the legal representatives of Israel C. Wait, have considered that matter, and directed me to report it back to the Senate with an amendment; and, as the bill is a very short one and is free from doubt, I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill, which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the legal representatives of Israel C. Wait, late lieutenant in the United States Navy, the sum of $1,500, that being the amount of an unpaid balance due him under the act of March 3, 1857.

The Committee on Claims reported the bill with an amendment to strike out the words "March 3, 1857," and to insert "January 16, 1857, entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the Navy.''"

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER. The bill speaks of an amount of money due this officer under a law. If it was due to him under a law, I wish to inquire why he could not receive it, why it was not paid to him?

Mr. CLARK. I will state—and I am obliged to the Senator for calling the attention of the Senate to it—there was an appropriation in 1857 out of which this claim could have been paid; but the time has gone by and that appropriation has lapsed and gone into the surplus fund, and there is no money now in the Treasury out of which it can be paid. It is standing due to him on the books of the Department, and is clearly due, but they want the funds out of which to pay it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee on the conduct of the war, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (S. No. 50) to authorize the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

MAIL CONTRACTS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to communicate to the Senate all the facts connected with the contracts of Messrs. Shepherd and Caldwell to carry the mail, on certain routes numbered 8818, 8819, 8849, and 8872, in the State of Missouri, and all papers connected with the suspension of said contracts.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 67) for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. MORGAN, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 68) to facilitate proceedings in admiralty and other judicial proceedings in the port of New York, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BOUNTIES TO VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. WILKINSON. I gave notice yesterday that I should to-day ask leave to introduce a joint resolution extending the benefits of the bounty granted by the act of July 22, 1861, to certain soldiers who entered the service of the United States prior to May 3, 1861. I now ask leave to introduce the joint resolution, and I ask that it may be acted upon to-day without a reference.

Leave was granted to introduce the joint resolution.

Mr. WILKINSON. I wish to state that the first Minnesota regiment was mustered into the service of the United States under the original proclamation of the President of April 15, 1861, for three months. It was mustered in on the 29th of April, 1861, a very short time after the proclamation. On the 3d of May, 1861, four days after the regiment was mustered into the service, the President issued another proclamation calling out three hundred thousand troops for three years or during the war. The Secretary of War sent a dispatch to the Governor of Minnesota that he could not receive this regiment for so short a time, as the expense of transportation in bringing them here would be too great, but that if the regiment would consent to serve for three years or during the war they would be ordered on to Washington. The regiment consented, every man of them, to go in under the proclamation of May 3, 1861, and they came here and have served in this army from that time to this. The regiment has been in twenty-five battles—at the first Bull Run, at Conrad's Ferry, at Ball's Bluff, at Winchester, at West Point, at Fair Oaks, at Savage Station, at both battles of Malvern Hill, at Antietam, at South Mountain, at Gettysburg, at Haymarket, at Bristow Station, and in several smaller engagements.

The Solicitor of the War Department has made this decision—it is a very strange one—"but a volunteer soldier enlisted prior to date of the President's proclamation of May 3, 1861, and of General Order No. 15, May 4, 1861, is not entitled to bounty of $100 under act of July 22, 1861," &c. I understand that the Solicitor of the War Department decides it upon the principle that inasmuch as the regiment was mustered into service before the proclamation of May 3, 1861, the presumption is that it has not served two years, and therefore not entitled to the bounty of $100 under the act of July 22, 1861.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will inform my colleague that the officer has reconsidered that decision.

Mr. WILKINSON. There are some reasons why the resolution should pass. This resolution which I have asked leave to introduce is intended to extend the benefits of this bounty to those soldiers; and there is no objection to it. I showed it to the Second Auditor this morning, who made some additions to it, and said that I was at liberty to say that he thought it ought to be passed.

It is a mere technical decision excluding this regiment from the benefits of the bounty. This regiment has lost already over two hundred men killed upon the battle-field, five hundred more wounded, with twenty of its officers. The lieutenant colonel has been eight times wounded. Only twelve men of this regiment have died of disease. Fifty of them have been mustered out of the service in order that they might receive commissions in other regiments. On the bloody battle-field of Gettysburg the first Minnesota volunteers lost two thirds of its officers and men, and yet there has not been up to this day a solitary member of the regiment who has received his bounty of $100 under the provisions of the act of July 22, 1861.

It is very surprising that a decision excluding these brave and gallant men from the benefit of the bounty should ever have been made, but it is made a good deal upon the theory of the judge in our State who was applied to to grant a writ of habeas corpus to release a man from the penitentiary who had been sent there by the judgment of a justice of the peace. As our local laws required that the petition for the writ should state upon what grounds the party was held in prison, it stated that he was held there by the decision and judgment of a justice of the peace. The judge refused to grant the writ, upon the ground that the constitution prohibited the justice from sentencing a man to the penitentiary, and therefore he could not be there; but the poor fellow was there. The Solicitor of the War Department decides that these troops cannot have served two years because they were mustered in at a time when there were no three years men called out; but many of the men have been killed in battle, and the others are in the Army yet. I hope the resolution will pass without being referred to a committee.

The joint resolution (S. No. 20) extending the benefits of the bounty granted by the act of July 22, 1861, to certain soldiers who entered the service of the United States prior to May 3, 1861, was read twice by its title.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let it be read at length.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, which proposes to extend the benefits of the act entitled "An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting the public property," approved July 22, 1861, so as to be applicable to and operate for the benefit of all volunteers who were mustered into the service of the United States prior to the date of the President's proclamation of May 3, 1863, if such volunteers have served the term prescribed in the act under such enlistment necessary to entitle them to the bounty therein provided for. It also proposes to extend the provisions of the sixth section of that act to the widows and heirs of such as have been or may be killed or die in the service.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I must object to the passage of the resolution without its being referred to a committee. It may involve a very considerable expenditure of money, and we ought to have the report of a committee on the subject.

Mr. WILKINSON. Of course it will involve some expenditure.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then it should be examined by a committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the joint resolution cannot be considered to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As it involves a question as to the construction of a law, I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That reference will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. HOWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Pacific Railroad be allowed to employ a clerk upon the same compensation allowed the clerks of other standing committees.

OATH OF OFFICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order of the day, which is now before the Senate, is the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] which will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the Senate:

The oath of affirmation prescribed by act of Congress of July 2, 1862, to be taken and subscribed before entering upon the duties of office, shall be taken and subscribed by every Senator in open Senate before entering upon his duties. It shall also be taken and subscribed in the same way by the Secretary of the Senate; but the other officers of the Senate may take and subscribe it in the office of the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To this resolution an amendment is offered by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert the following:

That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether Senators and Representatives in Congress are included within the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, and whether the said act is in accordance or in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

The question before the Senate is on agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. BAYARD addressed the Senate at length. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. I presume the Senator from Vermont can hardly be expected to go on this afternoon at this late hour, and as there is executive business to be attended to, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. That will leave the Senator from Vermont with the right to the floor when this question comes up at one o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont is understood to yield for that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 19, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DR. C. M. WETHERILL.

The SPEAKER announced the business first in order to be the following resolution, on which the main question was yesterday ordered, and the vote taken, no quorum voting:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the facts connected with the special details and absence from that Department of Dr. C. M. Wetherill, chemist of the Department of Agriculture; with power to send for persons and papers, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ORTH asked consent to make a statement of the circumstances under which the resolution was offered.

No objection was made.

Mr. ORTH. About a year ago a certain citizen of Illinois, whose name I do not now recollect, Captain Miller, I believe, brought to the notice of the President what he alleged was an improvement in gunpowder. The President directed that an investigation be made into the merits of this alleged new discovery; and in order to facilitate that investigation detailed Dr. Wetherill from the Agricultural Department.

Dr. Wetherill is well known to the country as one of the most scientific members of his profession. He commenced the discharge of his duties under this detail of the President, which was to terminate at the end of one month. At the expiration of that time, not having concluded his experiments, the Commissioner of Agriculture extended that detail indefinitely. The investigation was prosecuted during the summer months, and was concluded about the 1st of October. Dr. Wetherill then reported himself to the Commissioner of Agriculture, and found that he had been discharged.

Mr. Speaker, he is a constituent of mine. But whether a constituent of mine or not, I feel it to be my duty to bring forward the case of the humblest citizen of the Republic who feels aggrieved. I believe it likewise my duty to strike at the highest official in this Government, if necessary for the public welfare.

These are the facts. Dr. Wetherill is not a politician. He is a man of science. He thinks that his reputation is at stake in the way in which he has been treated. I ask, in his behalf, that the matter shall be investigated. From the time that he was detailed up to this day he has not received one dollar of his salary. It will not be proper for me to detail the interview which took place between the Commissioner of Agriculture and myself. Dr. Wetherill and his friends are willing that this matter shall be publicly investigated. He believes that the effect of the action of the Department will be to cast a stigma upon his reputation as a scientific man. He entered the Department of Agriculture in pursuit of the science in which he was educated. It is in his behalf that I desire this investigation should take place.

The resolution provides for calling for persons and papers. There are only two witnesses cognizant of the whole transaction, and the investigation will occupy not more than one or two days. If the House wants the Committee on Agriculture to look into it, I have no objection. I do not see any pertinency, however, in sending it to that committee, any more than to the Committee on Enrolled Bills. It is a special matter, with which they have nothing to do.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 50) to authorize the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War; and

A bill (H. R. No. 35) to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri.

CONFISCATION.

The SPEAKER stated the business in order to be the consideration of House bill No. 18, to amend a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bliss] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment. It is important that this resolution should be disposed of in some way at an early day. No committee can report until it is removed from before the House by favorable or adverse action. Therefore, for the purpose of enabling us to go on with other business, I desire to give notice that to-morrow I shall withdraw the motion to recommit, and demand the previous question in order to close debate.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, when he withdraws his present motion, he intends to give us an opportunity to vote on the amendments, of which notice has been given?

Mr. WILSON. I desire to have action of the House on the resolution as reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. Such are my instructions.

Mr. STEVENS. And allow no opportunity for amendment?

Mr. COX. I hope that the gentleman will not press action at that early day. I will say to him that half a dozen members on this side of the House wish to speak on the proposition. I ask in courtesy, in reference to a matter of such importance, that this side of the House should have an opportunity for full discussion. He cannot have action on it to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON. I have no disposition to press this upon the House unreasonably. I think that the time asked for by the other side has been granted already.

Mr. COX. This side of the House has had no opportunity to discuss the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I do not propose to call the previous question until to-morrow. Several speeches have been made already upon the resolution. I think, as I look upon the resolution, all pertinent speeches can be made in a short time. It does not involve a general question of confiscation, and if discussion be confined to it little additional time will be consumed.

Mr. KERNAN. I thank the gentleman for the opportunity he afforded me to state the ground of my dissent from the action of the committee. I did not then feel at liberty to go into the general argument. I know there are gentlemen upon both sides of the House who desire to speak merely to the merits of the resolution, and not to make political speeches. They desire to have an opportunity for a fair discussion upon the constitutional question involved in it, and upon the ground of policy, believing that it will be profitable to the country to have a discussion so long as gentlemen confine themselves to those points. As there will be but little time this morning for its discussion, I hope the gentleman will not feel himself called upon to bring us to a vote upon it so early as to-morrow. I hope there will be given, in good faith, a little more time, that each side of the House may argue this question which now for the first time really has come up for the consideration of Congress. And certainly there is no other matter upon which it is more important that we should act wisely and intelligibly.

Mr. SWBAT. I desire to say only a single word. I think gentlemen upon this side of the House feel, and have reason to feel, a great interest in having this matter, proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Wilson,] not only thoroughly discussed, but thoroughly understood before being called to act upon it. I say now—and I shall be governed hereafter by the declaration I now make—that I will not upon any occasion undertake to discuss any matter out of a factional feeling. I promise gentlemen upon the other side of the House that is not my object. All I ask—and I think I have a right to demand that—is that this House shall show moderation in their action, and that they shall be enabled, by allowing the discussion of questions touching the right of citizens under the Constitution, to act intelligibly upon matters which may come before them.

Now, without undertaking to impugn the want of understanding of anybody here, I do undertake to say I believe there are many members upon this floor who do not see the intent, the meaning, the design, the aim, and the object of the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa. To my mind it is striking at the very Constitution itself; and if it be not, what can be lost by discussing the matter?

I am not disposed by any means to discuss these questions elaborately, or to make a speech for the sake of making a speech, but I honestly and sincerely believe it my duty to myself, to my constituents, and to the people at large of this country, to secure for such a proposition as this thorough discussion, and if there are errors in it, to have it ventilated. Let this House act upon this matter intelligibly. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will not undertake to force us to a vote upon this subject. He says it has been delayed upon our instigation. When has there been an hour when any gentleman upon this side of the Chamber could reply to remarks made upon the other side? The gentleman from Ohio, upon my right, [Mr. Bliss,] has the floor; but no gentleman among us has been able to discuss the subject for a moment, except the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] who made a very few remarks the other day. I say we have had no time, and hence I say now, if it is undertaken to force us to a vote I shall resist it, and I shall resist it because I believe it my duty to resist it for the purpose of securing an opportunity for a thorough discussion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I appreciate the suggestion of my friend from Iowa in reference to the importance of having this measure out of the way. It blocks up the way against reports from all the committees which follow, and there can be no other report from any other committee until this measure is disposed of. But I also appreciate and acknowledge the reasonableness of the demand of gentlemen upon the other side of the House that they should have a fair opportunity to discuss this measure. I do not think we are so pressed for time that we cannot afford to give a fair and full opportunity for discussion. Hence I am in favor of that, and I was going to propose to my friend from Iowa—who I know desires discussion, and who does not fear the most ample and the fullest discussion upon any subject with which he is connected—that he should postpone the consideration of this matter for a few days, in order that the committees which come after his committee may be called, and some important subjects of legislation attended to. I do not think anything can be lost by such a course.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me say one single word. I wish to say to the gentleman from Iowa unless he allows us an opportunity to offer amendments I warn him beforehand his bill cannot pass. I think I know enough members upon this side of the House who will kill it. His bill is worse even than the original bill. If he will give us an opportunity to amend I do not care about discussion; but there must be a vote upon amendments or this bill cannot pass at all.

Mr. WILSON. It has been said that the proposition submitted by the other side of the House is a reasonable one. I do not know that any proposition has been submitted by them, and it may be that we can agree.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will make a proposition, and that is, that after my colleague [Mr. Bliss] shall have concluded his speech to-day the joint resolution shall be postponed until to-morrow, or some other day, after the morning hour, and that the discussion shall be allowed to go on as long as the House desires it.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to have some time fixed when we shall take the vote. That is my principal object. I am not particular whether it be to-morrow or the next day.

Mr. PENDLETON. The debate will not continue very long, but it is impossible now to fix the time.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to say in relation to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Stevens,] that if he and those whom he says are associated with him on this side of the House are determined to defeat this resolution, the responsibility will rest upon them and not upon me. If he has determined that if he cannot have his own way in relation to this resolution it shall not pass, let the responsibility rest with him, and not with me.

Now, I wish to say in conclusion, that for the present, inasmuch as both sides of the House desire to have further discussion, I have no objection to letting the debate run over to-morrow, and after that I shall take such course as shall seem best to me; but I do not intend to let this discussion run many days longer. I desire to have the House brought to a vote on the resolution. But at present I will permit the debate to go on without any understanding, governing myself according to circumstances that may arise, but intending to bring the House to an early vote on the resolution.

Mr. COX. I want the gentleman to understand that we wish to discuss the resolution between now and the time he calls the previous question.

Mr. WILSON. I have no control over that. The rules of the House will determine that matter.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Speaker, the debate in this House, on a motion pending to recommit to the Committee on the Judiciary House resolution No. 18, the same being a joint resolution to amend a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, has given rise to a conflict of opinion between gentlemen of different political parties as to the true intent and proper construction of that provision of the Constitution which limits the power of Congress in fixing the penalty of treason. I confess my surprise at any such difference of opinion; for until a considerable time after the inauguration of this Administration no difference of opinion existed among men of legal attainments, or among the people at large, as to the full effect of that clause in abolishing and repudiating forever in the United States of America the English policy of interrupting the legal descent of ancestral estates by corrupting and rendering uninheritable the blood of the issue, whatever might have been the ancestor's crime.

In section third of the third article, after defining the crime of treason against the United States, the framers inserted this clause:

"Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained."

It seems to me to be impossible that the framers of the Constitution, by the foregoing clause, meant anything less than what the words clearly import—an absolute interdiction of the doctrine or penalty of corruption of blood and a limitation of forfeiture of estate to the life of the convicted party. Their repugnance to the harsh inflictions of the British law was manifested as clearly in this as in other parts of the instrument. They had recently achieved a revolution by which they had thrown off the tyrannous oppressions of the British Government, and in establishing a new one for themselves and their posterity they were determined to protect the American people against all unjust and needless penalties inflicted by the State from whose authority they had revolted. They saw, as any one may see, that it was monstrous injustice to inflict upon an innocent child the greater part of the penalty due only to a guilty parent, and that the doctrine of corruption of blood incapacitating the innocent for their lawful inheritance produced precisely that result, and therefore protested against the barbarism by common consent, and put their protest into the fundamental law.

Can any gentleman perceive now, any more than the fathers could, the justice of wrenching from the hands of a child incapacitated by non-age and the want of moral accountability for any participation in the crime of his parent, the right of inheritance which is justly guaranteed to him by the law?

The wife who is to be made a widow by the infliction of the penalty of treason upon her husband may be as innocent as her cradled infant of his crime, and should her legal right to be endowed of his estate be taken from her? Does the Government desire to obtain property in that way? The Constitution answers No, and its voice is potential. It would certainly be difficult to supply any more clear and sufficient terms to impugn the corruption of blood altogether, and the forfeiture of estate beyond the lifetime of the attained party, than those employed in the clause cited. The style of the sentence is terse and compact—there are words enough in it to express with clearness the sense which I impute to it, and nothing more. It is divided by punctuation into three parts, each of which contains a proposition. The first part reads, "Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason." That is a complete sense. The second part reads, "but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood." That is also a complete sense. The third and last member of the sentence, separated from the preceding by a mark of punctuation, reads, "or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained," which last words, in addition to the former provision, that corruption of blood shall not be worked to defeat the inheritance of the estate of the attained by his legal heirs, provides also that no delay of the inheritance after the decease of the attained person shall occur by reason of the attainder, because the life of the attained is the limit of the forfeiture. It appears then clearly from these restrictions that the power given to Congress to declare the punishment of treason, although it authorizes legislation against the life of the guilty party, and for the forfeiture of his estate while he shall live, yet gives no authority to Congress to affect that estate after his death.

It has been said in this discussion that the forfeiture of a traitor's estate during his life merely would be a vain thing, inasmuch as the forfeiture can only be enforced by the same judgment of the court which consigns him to death, and that the interim between the sentence and the execution may be only a day. I cannot perceive any cogency in this argument, because the Constitution does not doom him to death, and Congress may punish him by imprisonment for life, and confiscation of his estate for life, or by other such penalty, operating within constitutional limits, as shall be deemed proper. Of course the framers could not know, and perhaps did not suppose, that Congress would impose the penalty of death.

The first general act for the punishment of crimes was passed by Congress in 1790, in which they prescribed for treason the penalty of death without forfeiture; and I believe that the law so remained until the confiscation act of 1862. Some time after the adoption by this Government of the comparatively humane policy of limiting forfeitures to life and eschewing corruption of blood, the English Parliament, in the reign of William IV, influenced by our example, adopted the American policy, and cast the oppressive doctrines of corruption of blood and forfeiture of estate beyond the life of the convict out of the legislation of Great Britain. Were the English statesmen also deceived as to the intent and meaning of our Constitution?

It cannot be denied that the understanding of able and learned men, jurists and commentators, who lived and acted at the time of the making of our Constitution, and shortly after, is of much weight whenever questions arise upon the construction of the Constitution. It is true that the gentleman from Maryland pronounces the views of these men on the subject before us "palpably wrong;" but, with great respect for his judgment in ordinary matters, I believe the opinion which we hold, as they did, is palpably right. My colleague has exhibited the opinion of Judge Story; and all legal minds in this country will estimate alike the value of that opinion. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORT] has produced several high authorities to the same effect, although he ignores their teaching. I will oblige that gentleman by furnishing him with what he informs us he sought vigilantly, but could not find, some wise voice, speaking from the time-honored pages of the Federalist, on this subject. Let the gentleman turn to the 173d page of this volume which I hold in my hand, and he will find, from the pen of no less distinguished a commentator than James Madison, the following paragraph:

"As treason may be committed against the United States, the authority of the United States ought to be able to punish it; but as new-fangled and artificial treasons have been the great engines by which violent factions, the natural offspring of free Governments, have usually wrecked their alternate malignity on each other, the Convention have, with great judgment, opposed a barrier to this peculiar danger by inserting a constitutional definition of the crime, fixing the proof necessary for conviction of it, and restraining the Congress even in punishing it, from extending the consequences of guilt beyond the person of its author."

That gentleman having assured us that commentators have all taken an absurd view of the subject, undertakes to solve the problem of construction in a more rational way. To bring about that solution and demonstrate its conclusiveness the gentleman avails himself of a new and modern perspicacity, which Story, Madison, Rawle, and other like men did not possess at the time of writing, and whose opinions, therefore, are entitled to less weight on that account. This new perspicacity arises from great advances recently made in the science of philology by which the learned have been enabled to illuminate the obscurity which to many surrounds the rooty origin of words. Of course, as we are a progressive people, we must learn to reinterpret our Constitution and laws according to the new philological light. By applying this improved advantage to the construction of the involved clause the gentleman comes out all right. He philologizes away the little word "except," and then he has corruption of blood and forfeiture of estate unlimited, the result of the new and improved process, applied to the clause, being this conclusion, that what the Constitution requires is that the judicial proceedings against the guilty party shall be had in his lifetime—thus forbidding the injustice of instituting an action against a dead man, upon whom no better service of process could be made than by pasting the writ or warrant on his coffin or tombstone. I am on the whole constrained to believe that with such results from what is claimed to be improved interpretation, we had better adhere to the teachings of common sense. Did the makers of the Constitution intend to prevent, or did they imagine the possibility of legal proceedings to enforce the penalties of treason being instituted or prosecuted after the death of the accused? Certainly not.

The gentleman from Indiana seems to be not quite clear, even with his new light upon this subject of corruption of blood and forfeiture of estate. The second and third divisions of the cited clause, although they import distinct ideas, both look and inure to the same effect in this, that they provide that no incapacity to inherit shall attach to the heir, and that no forfeiture shall attach to the estate to prevent the inheritance.

The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS] who once, as he says, adopted the construction of the Constitution for which I contend, but now sees the matter in another light, argues, among other suggestions, that the alleged restrictions of the Constitution, having relation to an attainder, which means a forfeiture by the judgment of a court, are inapplicable to the process of forfeiture under the confiscation act of 1862. He says, if he has read aright, the law does not attach forfeiture or confiscation to an attainder on conviction of treason. If the gentleman will turn his attention to the seventh section of that act, he will find that the entire substance of the proceedings under that act consists in the forfeiture, upon proof of treason, by judicial judgment, of the property of a person shown in court to have been guilty of the facts which constitute that crime, and therefore such proceedings are, in principle, in no way distinguished from those had on indictments for treason, where forfeiture follows conviction, and is made a part of the judgment and sentence. The proceedings under the confiscation law to attach forfeiture to the estate of the party after the period of his life, are judicial proceedings to inflict the very penalty which the Constitution prohibits, for the offense upon which the forfeiture is predicated is treason. The findings and orders of the court, as provided for in that act, are substantially and in effect attainders of treason. Prescribing a new method of doing a forbidden thing does not help the dilemma. As an argument to show that the framers did not intend to protect estates from forfeiture to follow the laws of blood inheritance, it is said that the costs of the conviction and fines adjudged are liens upon the estate of the deceased, and that against the heir it may be appropriated to pay them. This argument fails to exhibit the slightest analogy, for fines and costs are simply like civil debts, to be paid out of the estate of a deceased debtor, but do not involve at all the idea of forfeiture, which as a penalty sweeps away a whole estate without regard to value or amount.

But a more appreciable reason has been given by the gentleman from Maryland for urging this policy. He informs us that the fixed policy of the Administration is the unconditional confiscation of the property of rebels. This may be true at the present time, but I always supposed that the President was an essential part of an Administration, and certainly at one time, when this very confiscation bill was under his consideration, he perceived insurmountable constitutional objections to the unrestricted forfeitures provided for by its terms. This state of his mind he made known to Congress in the most emphatic way, by his prepared and announced veto, and, as all know, the result of this was the explanatory and restrictive resolution which it is now proposed to repeal as an incumbrance upon the effectiveness of the act. The passage of the resolution was understood by the country as a confession that the President and the Democrats were right on the question.

But we of this side of the House are told, in effect, by the gentleman from Maryland, that no sympathy for or support of the Administration is desired from us; and that any profession of a willingness to aid the Administration in any matter in which we can perceive that it is right is not received with any cordiality on his side of the House. The probability is that we shall not often feel called upon to make ourselves offensive in that way, for that is not our principal business here. We have resting upon us, however, a solemn obligation to do precisely what the gentleman thinks we might better forbear, to discuss such constitutional questions as may affect the integrity and permanence of this Government; to contend against the advancing strides of revolutionary policy, and to invoke the attention of our fellow-legislators to the consideration of the great principles upon which our Government is founded; to obey the will of our constituents by endeavoring to promote the best and surest means of relieving our bleeding country from the nameless horrors of civil war, and restoring to the people of all the States and to the Government the sacred Constitution of our fathers and the Union as it was. In these disjointed times, when the doctrines of the republican fathers are openly impugned and an infringing revolution is defacing the fair features of the people's free Government; when essential portions and principles of the Constitution are voted upon the table, the conservatism which is left unfettered and uncontaminated will not fail, in view of the boon to be struggled for and the calamity to be contended against, to show its entire front; and though the number of its votaries in the high places of the Government in this dark day of the Republic may be too limited for their immediate success, yet the trust and hope they have in truth and justice will insure their incessant labor for the salvation of the country until either the wished for or the dreaded consummation shall come.

I occasionally hear gentlemen upon the other side of this House allude with apparent pride and self-gratulation to the successes of their party in the elections of the last year; in answer to all which, and to suggest a reason for the mollification of the boast, I propose to acknowledge the rightfulness of their predominance, when they will show to us that upon a fair, honest, and uncoerced canvass they could have had a majority of the votes of freemen, qualified and citizenized, in the States and precincts where they won their victories.

Aside from the constitutional inability of Congress to make and put in operation such a law as the confiscation act of 1862 would be without the restriction of the resolution which was intended to restrain its scope to the limits of the Constitution, I am fully persuaded that, as a matter of policy, it assures no benefit to the Government or people to apologize for even a possible infraction of the Constitution.

One of my worthy colleagues [Mr. GARFIELD] says on this subject that he would not break the Constitution at all, unless it should become necessary to overleap its barriers to save the Government and the Union. I can assure my conservative colleague that no such monstrous jump is demanded of him. Such leaps would be dangerous to him, to the Government, and the Union—dangerous as was the fatal leap of a historic man who dared to throw himself from the dizzy height of Niagara. I ask, what benefit is expected to be derived to the Government from untying the ultraisms of the conscription bill, and playing fantastic tricks with the Constitution? It is manifest that the effect of that bill, unfettered, would be to put a large portion of the real estate of the southern States under the auctioneer's hammer—for such is the enactment of the bill—which might and would be bought by the northern speculators at such contemptible prices as might enrich the speculators, but would bring but very little money into the Treasury of the United States. Yes, it would indeed be a splendid scheme for speculation. How many fortunes would be made by loyal purchasers out of such forfeited estates, no matter how much of poverty, starvation, and death it should occasion; no matter how much of suffering may fall to the lot of the innocent, disinherited child; no matter that the wail of the houseless and stricken widow shall pierce the air as she wanders away with her homeless infant. These terrible considerations cannot be permitted to disturb the success of the speculation. Such policy conferred by military power might perhaps drive the southern people from the face of the earth, exterminating them as Indian tribes have sometimes been exterminated; but who, in his heart, can wish for such a consummation? Desire for the success of the Administration should prevent it. Love of the Government and hope of a restoration of the Union should appeal against it. It is not what a majority of the people of the middle and western States desire. Their desire, in which many southern people concur, is to have the seceded States restored to the Union; to have reinstated over southern people and southern soil the supremacy and the protection of the Government of the United States.

For this great and patriotic object the bravest and the most enlightened of our soldiers have voluntarily imperiled their lives upon the battle-field. Who believes that these patriotic men would have voluntarily incurred all the dangers and hardships of a most sanguinary war, facing the certain death of so many thousands of their numbers, for the ignoble purpose of destroying a large portion of their own fair country? No, they volunteered by thousands from the political party to which I belong, and I gave my voice heartily by way of inducement, their only object being to execute by their united strength trusted and repeated pledges made from the highest places of authority, that their patriotism and sacrifices should inure to the desired end of a restored Union, when, without revolution or change of system, the old benign Government should sway again the North and the South. It would be a thousand times more advantageous to our cause to rigidly perform this pledge than to confiscate all the property of the seceded States.

If the foregoing suggestions are not all germane to the subject which should alone have been under discussion, that being merely a constitutional question, my apology can be found only in the fact that I have kept within the field opened by the gentlemen who support the other side of the question.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, notified the House that the Senate had passed joint resolutions and a bill of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House, namely:

Joint resolution (S. No. 18) in relation to the public printing;

Joint resolution (S. No. 2) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Joseph Hooker, Major General George G. Meade, and Major General Oliver O. Howard, and the officers and soldiers of the army of the Potomac;

Joint resolution (S. No. 5) of thanks to Major General Ambrose E. Burnside, and the officers and men who fought under his command;

Joint resolution (S. No. 14) presenting the thanks of Congress to Cornelius Vanderbilt for a gift of the steamer Vanderbilt; and

An bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for the day after to-morrow after the morning hour.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the joint resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, the subject before the House, uninteresting as a matter of debate, is already a good deal hackneyed. Having assented in the committee to this report, it may not be amiss for me to state, with such clearness and brevity as I can command, the grounds on which my assent was given.

It was suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] who spoke early in this debate, that while he doubted the constitutional authority of Congress to confiscate absolutely the real estate of traitors, even if he were convinced of that authority he should doubt the wisdom of such a public policy. I submit to that gentleman, and to those who sympathize with him upon this point, that if it be clearly shown that such a power exists, then it was granted by the framers of the Constitution for some purpose, anticipating or apprehending an exigency in the fortunes of the country when it might be expedient and proper to put that power in full force.

Now, if that power exists in the Constitution, I ask the gentleman from New York whether he expects that the men who framed the Constitution could have anticipated any condition of public affairs in which the exigency would be more urgent than that which exists at the present time? It is well enough for nations to be merciful, but justice is a higher attribute than mercy. Now, if the power exists, I submit that the exigency for its extreme exercise exists also. It is a very different thing to men engaged in this treason whether they hold their lands by authority of law or whether they hold them at the pleasure and by the favor of the Government against which they have rebelled. In this condition of things I hold it to be the duty of the country and Government to seek for a true interpretation of the Constitution, to ascertain as exactly as possible the limits of congressional authority, and march boldly in the organization of a system of justice and penalties to the very limits of that authority, wherever they may be found; and then let the amnesty come, so that we can distinguish between great offenders who, of their own motion and against the Constitution, in violation of the rights not only of their country but of all mankind, not only of this age but of all coming ages, rebelled against the Government, and those who have been duped, misled, seduced from their public duty. On these we will have compassion; and gentlemen on the other side will come to understand that the majority here and in the country will execute justice and remember mercy also.

I am not sure, sir, that there is any material difference between the report of the committee and the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the effect to be produced on such rebels as may be made amenable to the statute of July 17, 1862. I understand the joint resolution now before the House to be of such a character that if adopted it will be the duty of the courts of the country to administer the penalties prescribed in the law to the full limits of constitutional authority. If by repealing the joint resolution of July 17, 1862, and putting into operation the law unrestricted, or if by enacting another and more stringent statute we transcend the Constitution, it will be the duty of the courts to limit the statute within constitutional authority. Therefore, practically, I do not see that there is a difference between the joint resolution and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. STEVENS. The resolution of the committee restricts all the forfeitures under the confiscation act to what they are already in the case of attainer for treason in the Constitution. Now, the act itself has no reference to the section of the Constitution referred to; but there are confiscations outside of that entirely, not for treason, but as the property of alien enemies. Therefore the resolution of the committee confines the operation of the act of 1862 much more than the original resolution did. If the gentleman will modify the resolution so as to make it read that the act of 1862 shall produce no forfeiture beyond the limits of the Constitution, I am content.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I understand that to be the object of the joint resolution. But I will say, by way of answer to the first suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that when I find in the Constitution, as in that part relating to treason, distinct and definite authority given to the Government in the way of punishment, we cannot look to any other provision of the Constitution, or to any general principle for the purpose of getting authority to inflict other and different penalties. The authority is to be found in that provision of the Constitution or it is not to be found anywhere.

Something has been said in the course of this debate in regard to the act of July, 1862, and something is found in the President's message touching the authority of Government to proceed in rem, as it is called, under the fifth section of this act, the allegation being that such proceedings are not by due process of law as required by the Constitution. An analogy has been drawn in some quarters from the authority of the Government in prize courts. It does not follow, necessarily, that because the Government may proceed in rem against enemies' property found on the ocean it may therefore proceed against other property found in other and different positions. The principle, as I understand, of the law on which proceedings in rem are justified in prize cases is this: enemies' property being found in transitu on the ocean, a presumption is at once created that either that property or the proceeds of it in one way or other are to inure to the benefit of the public enemy, and no inquiry can be instituted in court as to whether the particular owner is an enemy or a friend. It is sufficient that he is de facto under the jurisdiction of the belligerent, that he is an inhabitant of the territory against the people of which we are waging war. Apply the principle to the authority given to the President under the fifth section of this act to seize the property of certain individuals.

Property on land is not subject to seizure or confiscation, because there is no presumption existing generally that it is to be used for the benefit of the enemy. It may be taken for the necessities of the Army, but it cannot be proceeded against in rem as property taken upon the sea may be.

It is necessary, when we propose a new measure, to find authority in one of two conditions of things—either in a principle not heretofore established, or else in a principle heretofore recognized but not extended in its application so as to sustain the proposed measure.

I submit to the House, as justifying the seizures provided for in the fifth section of the act of July 17, 1862, that while the condition of this property belonging to rebels does not create the presumption in and of itself that it is to be used in support of the rebellion, still the law itself requires proof equivalent to the evidence on which presumption is to be based in the case of enemies' property being taken on the ocean. By the fifth and sixth sections of the act, the Government is to show that the owner of this rebel property is an officer in the army or navy, or in the civil service, of rebels in arms against the Government of the United States.

And when we have established that fact, is it not equal to the presumption that arises when enemies' property is taken in transitu on the water? Upon such proof it is a fair presumption that the property belonging to a rebel officer in arms against the United States is either designed of itself to be for the benefit of the rebels, or else that it is to be converted into other property which is to inure to the benefit of the rebellion. Therefore it follows that the same principles which justify proceedings in rem in prize cases justify proceedings in rem against the various persons specified in the fifth section of the act of July 17, 1862. And therefore I feel satisfied, for one, that by this reference to the matter the difficulty is substantially cleared of doubt.

I come next—for I do not mean to occupy the attention of the House a great while—to the particular authority granted by the Constitution for doing what we propose shall be done; and I commend to the gentlemen on the other side of the House a reflection which must be common to us all who have had some experience in public or in professional life. The authority of a statute or the scope of a constitutional provision can never be fairly considered or discussed, as a measure, until there is an actual case arising, and nothing is more common than for the courts of the various States, whenever a call is made on them for an opinion on a matter in reference to which no case has actually arisen—and such calls are occasionally made by the executive or legislative branches of State governments—either to decline to give an opinion, or, if an opinion is given, to submit it with the distinct understanding that the court is not bound by it. It is only when a case is before a court and arguments are submitted that a true construction can be attained.

I did not agree at all with the gentleman who last addressed the House [Mr. BLISS] as to the effect of Mr. Madison's commentary upon this provision of the Constitution. That, however, I shall have occasion to consider hereafter.

One word in regard to Judge Story's authority. I dare say, from the nature of the language used by him in his Commentaries, that he understood this provision of the Constitution as interpreted by gentlemen on the other side of the House.

I would not disparage Judge Story as a lawyer, but as a great man, as a man of capacious and grasping intellect, he must be placed in the second class of the great men which this country has produced. He had no case before him. He has merely followed English law. What he has written down in his Commentaries is a reproduction of what he has read in the English books.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was received by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, notifying the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 34) in favor of the legal representatives of Israel C. Wait; and

A bill (S. No. 49) relating to the admission of patients to the hospital for the insane in the District of Columbia.

The House then resumed the consideration of

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

Mr. BOUTWELL. One word in regard to the language of Mr. Madison. Our fathers, when they framed the Constitution, intended manifestly to guard against two things: first, the forfeiture of estates by proceedings instituted subsequently to the death of the offender; and secondly, the attainting or corruption of blood by which the heirs of the offender should become incapable either to enjoy the estates which had not been forfeited or which might descend to them from the progenitors of the offender, and subsequently to his death. The Constitution has sufficiently guarded Congress upon these two points, and the language of Mr. Madison relates to these limitations upon the powers of Congress.

I call attention to a very singular circumstance in connection with this provision of the Constitution. I find in examining it as printed in the Manual that it is without punctuation after "blood" and after "forfeiture." In the copy of the Constitution prefixed to the statutes as printed by Little & Brown, there is a comma after "blood" and another after "forfeiture." These circumstances led me to look at the original instrument in the office of the Secretary of State, and I find that there is a comma after "blood" but none after "forfeiture." The Secretary of State was so thoroughly convinced that such was the reading of the Constitution that I have an official certificate from him to that effect. It will be said very likely that punctuation is never regarded in the construction of statutes. That is the legal declaration; but I never knew a person so entirely insensible to the influence of facts that he could discuss and consider and decide upon a statute regardless of punctuation. In such an instrument as the Constitution, framed with care, and signed by men who were responsible for it to the country and to future ages, it is to be presumed that everything, even to the punctuation, was deemed a matter of importance. Punctuation, even in a statute hastily and loosely drawn, decides its interpretation whenever the language is equivocal or ambiguous.

It is worthy of observation that that portion of the Constitution which sets forth the evidence necessary to convict of treason is drawn not only literally but exactly from an English statute passed in the seventh year of William III, showing that our ancestors were familiar with English law on this subject. But we need not even a single piece of testimony on this point, for we know very well that they were versed in the English law and in everything relating to the feudal system as no other body of men ever were in Great Britain or in this country.

I think it not out of place to refer to a work not much known and hardly ever read. I refer to the correspondence between the provincial House of Representatives of Massachusetts and the provincial Governors of Massachusetts from 1765 to 1774, in which the whole feudal system is discussed with clearness, power, and precision such as is exhibited in no other work I have ever seen. It relieves our revolutionary contest from that historic fable that we instituted a war for independence upon the subordinate issue of a tax of three pence a pound upon tea. Our ancestors, in their legal and solid and responsible arguments, never put the contest upon that basis. It might have been a ground of appeal to the people, but through the feudal system they traced our rights to the king, and maintained with great clearness that they were no more amenable to the Parliament of Great Britain than the Parliament of Great Britain was to the Legislatures of the several colonies in this country. They maintained that the people of the colonies and the people of Great Britain were independent of each other. The argument of this correspondence throws light upon one of the allegations in the Declaration of Independence.

The colonists rebelled against George III not because he was not the legitimate king, but because he combined with the Parliament to deprive the people of this country of their liberties. Now, then, our ancestors knew well the legal history of Great Britain in reference to treason and forfeiture. Blackstone refers us to a provision of statutes against treason passed in the reign of Elizabeth, and he uses this phrase in regard to the forfeiture as limiting the power of the courts: "Save only for the life of the offender." If our ancestors intended that forfeiture should be only for the life of the offender in all cases, how has it happened that when they went to the statute of William III for the exact language used in stating the evidence necessary to a conviction for treason, they should have used language which rendered their meaning uncertain? At a later time during the reign of Elizabeth it was provided by statute that persons convicted of treason should forfeit all their goods and chattels, and the use of their lands, tenements, and hereditaments during their natural lives only. This statute remained in force until about the time of the union of Scotland and England.

When we consider that the men who framed the Constitution had this language before them, that they extracted a certain portion of the Constitution from the statute of William III, is it to be presumed that they should have neglected to make this point clear if they had such a purpose as is contended for by the gentlemen on the other side of the House? So far from their having any such purpose on their part, I think it the plainer, more natural, and inevitable construction of the Constitution that the contrary is the case. I believe that gentlemen will see as they go on in this debate, or in their practical experience of the operation of the law, that it is a reflection upon the judgment of our ancestors to maintain that they intended to do that which gentlemen on the other side of the House say they have done. We are to look upon this question as a question of public policy to a certain extent.

Suppose a man is convicted of treason, and is proceeded against as gentlemen on the other side of the House allege. The offender is to be executed in forty days. You forfeit his life estate in his land. He has a remainder which he can sell to a brother traitor not yet convicted, and perhaps not yet suspected, and his property then converted into money is serviceable to the rebellion. Was it not the intention of the framers of the Constitution that forfeiture of estate should not only deprive the offender of his life, and thereby be a penalty upon him, but did they not think also that the cause with which he was identified should be deprived to that extent of the means of support? Gentlemen construe the Constitution in such a manner that when we have forfeited the estate during his life, that the offender may then put the remainder into money, which, in such a case, would be the chief value of the estate, and turn it into the treasury of the rebels.

I have said that by the Constitution our fathers intended to do two things; and a true interpretation of this clause, according to the punctuation, shows that their ends were accomplished. Congress has power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason can work corruption of blood. Here are two propositions. Congress has power to declare the punishment of treason; that is, the full, supreme, unlimited power, except as it may be controlled by the two clauses following: "But no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood." That is an absolute prohibition upon the power exercised by the British Parliament to work corruption of blood through attainder of treason. If the construction contended for by gentlemen upon the other side of the House prevails, I do not see why the Constitution must not be read to this effect: "that no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood except during the life of the person attained."

But who does not see the absurdity of this working a corruption of blood during the life of the person attained? Under the Constitution we can do to the person convicted all those things which by the corruption of blood could have been worked by the common law of England. We can make him an outlaw, and therefore to say that we have authority, under the Constitution, to work corruption of blood during the lifetime of the offender is simply an absurdity. It does not give us any power which we could not exercise without that provision. "But no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood"—thus securing one object they had in view—"or forfeiture of estate during the life of the person attained."

I do not feel any apprehension as to what the judgment of the House may be upon the meaning of the word "except," whether it is regarded as the equivalent of "unless" or not. But I think it clear, from a reference already made, that two centuries ago "except" had for a synonym "unless." The gentleman from Ohio remarked that the judge of the eastern district of Virginia had said that "except" did not mean "except," but meant something else. The judge, I apprehend, said no such thing. He said that "unless" was the synonym of "except," and that our fathers often used the word "except" where "unless" might be used by us. One quotation has been made which I commend to gentlemen on the other side, in connection with this bill, and also with the peculiar sympathy which they seem to show to their deluded brethren of the South—I do not know as they regard it as authority—"Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish." [Laughter.]

But I accept "except" just exactly as they desire to have it understood in the Constitution. Gentlemen in this House and elsewhere have made a distinction which nowhere exists in the Constitution. The word "forfeiture" has not a particular reference to real estate, more than to goods and chattels. "Forfeiture!" Forfeiture of what? Of that which men possess. Gentlemen say, "Life estate is real estate." And here again we see how we have been misled by British institutions. Before this Constitution was framed, entail and primogeniture were comparatively unknown in this country. It is possible there were a few entailed estates in some of the States of the Union, or estates entailed for a limited period of time. Now, knowing as we do that our fathers were opposed to the whole system of entail and primogeniture, is it to be supposed they intended, when they were attempting to fix the pains and penalties to the crime of treason, to introduce this doctrine of entail and separate estates, of fee-tail and remainder?

They intended, when they said "forfeiture," that the party convicted should be deprived of exactly that which he possessed, neither more nor less. Where the estate is a life estate, it forfeits the life estate; and where the estate is in fee the forfeiture must apply to the whole estate. The laws of the States generally do not recognize any such estate as a life estate except in particular cases.

Now, here is a great question—one which may possibly be satisfactorily answered, but how, I do not see. All the laws relating to the tenure of estates are framed by the several States, and in most of the States there is no separate estate known as a life estate. Whoever owns the fee has the whole estate. Now what, upon the construction claimed by gentlemen upon the other side, is to be the effect? Can Congress create an estate in certain States in this Union which by the laws of such States does not exist?

I hold, as a matter of constitutional law, that Congress has no power to create a life estate in Massachusetts even for the purpose of wresting it from a traitor, if there be one there. The Congress of the United States and the laws of the United States in reference to the forfeiture of the property of criminals must take that property just exactly as it is declared and defined by the law of the State. Mr. Clay said in 1839, upon another and very different matter; that "that is property which the law recognizes as property." We have no such property recognized by the laws of the State, except in particular cases, as life estate. If then you find a traitor in Massachusetts, if you arraign and convict him and inflict a penalty upon him, you must forfeit his property, whether lands or chattels, exactly as it exists under the laws of the State. You cannot create a life estate and forfeit it and give the remainder to somebody else.

Upon all these facts, Mr. Speaker, I can come but to this conclusion, that the framers of the Constitution intended to guard against two evils in the British system: first, the forfeiture of the estate by proceedings instituted after the death of the offender; and secondly, to prevent corruption of blood so as to disable the heirs of an offender from inheriting through his blood. The construction I have given to the Constitution secures those two objects, and it must be observed that it gives full force and effect to every word in the instrument relating to treason; and when we have found a satisfactory use for every word in a legal instrument it is unnecessary to look beyond, and especially when we find that the interpretation is consistent with the general policy and ideas of the country. I have, then, no hesitation, for one, in sustaining a measure, be it this joint resolution or any other, which shall provide for the forfeiture of the estates of persons convicted of treason, whether those estates be in goods and chattels, or lands held by fee-simple title, or in land in which the offender has a life estate. If he has a life estate merely, he forfeits that; if he owns the fee simple, he forfeits the fee; if he owns goods and chattels, he forfeits his goods and chattels. We thus inflict a necessary and just punishment to the offender, and take security that his property will not by some indirection be used in behalf of the rebellion.

Mr. SWEAT obtained the floor.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. The morning hour having expired, I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN stated that at the last session of the committee the bill was read over, and amendments were offered by the Committee of Ways and Means, with the understanding that it should again be read over for general amendments.

The Clerk read the first section of the bill.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the section by striking out "sixty cents" in the tenth line, and inserting "one dollar;" so that it will read:

That from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duty provided for in section forty-one of an act entitled "An act to support the Government, and to pay interest on the public debt," approved July 1, 1862, and in addition to duties payable for licenses, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all spirits that may be distilled and sold, or removed for consumption and sale, of first proof, the duty of one dollar on each and every gallon.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because it seems to me to be due to those who are engaged in the manufacture of the article under consideration that the tax upon it should be permanent, and that they should not be subjected to this capricious legislation. I suppose the Committee of Ways and Means contemplate gradually carrying this tax up to a dollar on the gallon, and that being the case, which I assume, I insist that it ought to be placed there at once, and become permanent at that point, or at some point, so that those who engage in the manufacture of this article may understand the liability to which they are exposed in its manufacture. I take it that one of the very worst things for any interest is this capricious and ever-varying legislation. We have already imposed a tax of twenty cents a gallon. We now propose to put it at sixty cents, and by and by it will be put up to eighty cents, and then to one dollar; and all this inures, not to the benefit of the Government nor to the benefit of the manufacturer, but to the benefit of those who buy up the article, keep it on hand, and then agitate for an advance in the tax.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call your attention and that of the House, as we are all familiar with Scripture, or ought to be, and hence I will assume the fact, to the case of a certain individual who in ancient times hired his son-in-law, and kept constantly changing his wages, changing them, I believe, some fourteen times. At first the young man was to have the increase of the flocks marked so and so; but as soon as his father-in-law found that he was growing rich under one arrangement, he immediately changed it and made another.

What is wanted, above all things, is that legislation shall be permanent, and not fickle and ever-changing. I therefore insist that we should now place the tax on distilled liquors at some point where it will remain permanently, and not be changeable at the will and caprice of those men who buy up this article in large quantities after it has passed from the hands of the distiller, and then commence agitating for an advance in the tax. It was first twenty cents; it is now proposed to be made sixty cents; by and by it will be carried up to eighty cents, and then it will go to a dollar. It should be fixed so that those who invest their capital in the manufacture of this article may know how to govern themselves. You will recollect that that old curmudgeon-like father-in-law of Jacob changed his wages fourteen times.

A MEMBER. And yet Jacob grew rich.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Yes; he grew rich because the Lord prospered him. I propose that the tax shall be made just and permanent. I am told by those who are well informed on this subject that the class of persons who are to be affected by this law have marched up to the payment of their revenue taxes liberally and patriotically, and have not attempted to dodge or evade the provisions of the law; and I insist that they shall be dealt with justly and honorably. I understand that they do not care at what point you fix it, so only that you make it permanent. It is the fickle and ever-changing legislation that works harshly to them. I ask therefore that, as the Committee of Ways and Means intend ultimately to carry up this tax to a dollar, it be now placed at that sum. Then the law will be permanent, and there will be no encouragement to speculation, no buying up of this article and then agitating for an increase of the tax, not that it may accrue to the benefit of the country or of the Government, but to the benefit of speculators.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois proposes to increase the tax on distilled spirits from sixty cents to one dollar per gallon; and he has advanced, as an argument or reason in favor of his proposition, that this tax should be permanent. Sir, I had supposed that the necessity for the excise law grew out of the war, and that the war was but temporary. I had not been prepared for an argument of that character, which presumes that the war is to be a permanent one; for I assume that when the necessity for these large expenditures of public money shall cease, by the restoration of peace and harmony in this country, then the excise law will be repealed, and the ordinary revenue of the Government from imports will be considered sufficient to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government. But, sir, it appears that we are now to legislate for all future time based on the supposition that this war is to have no end. I am very free to say, Mr. Chairman, that I think that if certain measures of legislation before the two Houses of Congress are carried out, and if the policy of this national Administration is carried out, gentlemen might as well commence to legislate for a very long war; because if the rebel government itself had control of the action of the Federal Administration it could not, in my judgment, better aid its own cause than we are doing.

The gentleman from Illinois tells us that we want permanency in legislation. Well, sir, it is the calamity of this country, and always has been, that our legislation and whole character have been unstable. Commerce requires stability. It is necessary that the merchant shall understand what is to be the action of the Government with reference to the commodity in which he deals. It is the mutation, the continual changes, the fickleness in public and private affairs in this country, as contrasted by European Governments and European commercial regulations which, in my judgment, has retarded a progress that has already been astounding. The gentleman from Illinois says he wants to have a tax of a dollar per gallon placed on whisky; the only argument being that it should be permanent. Sir, does any gentleman conceive that the action of the last Congress or of this Congress is to be permanent? Does the gentleman suppose that the confiscation bill, the emancipation policy, and all of these odious and unconstitutional acts are to be permanent in this country?

No, sir, it is paying as poor a compliment to their patriotism as it is to their intelligence to suppose that these laws, or these policies, or this Administration is to be permanent in its character.

Sir, I am opposed to the proposition to increase this tax to one dollar. I am opposed to it for two reasons: in the first place because it creates an unnecessary burden upon that portion of spirits which is used in the various articles of manufacture; and again, it increases improperly, in my judgment, the burden upon that portion of spirits which is to be used for drinking consumption.

Sir, the laboring portion of the community in this country must have its beverage. It is as much entitled to have its beverage as the aristocratic portion of the community is entitled to have its beverage. If one consumes the finer wines of Europe, the other consumes the domestic manufactures of the country. I will not stop here to say which contributes most to the patriotism or to meet the necessities of the country.

Now, sir, whisky, as a beverage, is consumed by the poorer class of the people, by the laboring men, who cannot afford to indulge in the more expensive wines and brandies. And, sir, in these times, when all articles of necessity are so dear, I cannot see the wisdom or propriety of stepping in here and placing so extraordinary a burden upon what has become an article of prime necessity to the laboring classes of the country.

Therefore, in my judgment, the Committee of Ways and Means have gone to the extreme limit, nay, they have gone to an extraordinary limit, in this matter; a limit which, according to the estimated production of whisky for 1864, will produce an income of $36,000,000. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] proposes to increase the rate of tax to an extent that, upon the estimated production, would give a revenue of $54,000,000.

Now, sir, in my judgment that is an undue proportion of the revenue to be raised from excise taxes to be imposed upon one single article, and that an article of necessity upon the part of the laboring classes of the country; and so regarding the tax which it is now proposed to be laid upon the article of spirits, I shall feel it to be my duty to vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, by increasing the tax to $1 20 per gallon.

The proposition which I now submit increases the tax twenty cents a gallon beyond the rate proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY.] Now, sir, I am sincere in this amendment. I think it ought to prevail, and I will not say that I think it ought to prevail upon the ground alone that we are to require a heavy tax for the purpose of carrying on this war; not at all. I have nothing to say to propitiate the whisky interest of this country, or the drinking interest of this country. I believe we owe it to ourselves to increase largely the tax upon this article which is vicious in its tendencies; and which is unnecessary. If, as suggested by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, men will have it, let them pay for it.

I am willing that my party, if I have a party which is in the habit of drinking whisky, shall pay a tax of three or five dollars a gallon for it, if they will drink it as a beverage.

I can conceive very readily how natural it is for the gentleman over the way [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] to oppose this high tax upon whisky. It may be true, as was asserted by an eminent subterranean Democrat of the city of New York, whose name I cannot recall, it was so many years ago, that these corner groceries are the indispensable nurseries of Democracy. [Laughter.] I do not stand here to dispute that assertion. I believe that the corner groceries of our cities are nurseries of Democracy; they are, at any rate, nurseries of a certain kind of Democracy, and I would like to see them swept from the face of the earth.

Then, sir, will the raising of this tax reduce the consumption of whisky in the country? I believe it will reduce that consumption; I believe if you will levy a high tax upon whisky there will be a less consumption upon the part of the thousands and millions of the people of the country than is consumed now. This belief will govern my vote upon this article, in respect to the taxes we are to levy upon it, and apply to other articles which cannot be classed among those of absolute necessity. The consumption will be less in proportion as the tax is greater, because men cannot spare the money to purchase if the cost is high. The laboring people, who the gentleman from New York says drink whisky, do it because they cannot procure the money to purchase brandy. They have not the money to buy brandy, and therefore they do not consume brandy, but poisonous whisky. And thus, if the cost of whisky is increased the consumption will be less.

The gentleman says that with a tax of $2 50 per gallon in Great Britain the consumption has increased. I do not think the tables so speak. I think those best qualified to speak in Great Britain are of the opinion that if the tax upon alcoholic liquors was made less the consumption would be greater than it is at the present time.

There is another reason why I wish to have a high tax upon whisky. In the midst of an unprecedentedly severe winter we find ourselves needing all the grain that can be furnished for the purpose of feeding our stock and supplying the Army.

If we stimulate the production of whisky we will not have corn enough left for the feeding of the stock in the western States. I would rather that the corn and rye should be used for stock than for the production of whisky, and the people, I am sure, would rather gain than suffer thereby. We are informed now that there is a deficiency in the supply of the one article of corn of more than one hundred million bushels. What should we do as wise men, then, but reduce as far as possible the production of whisky? If I had the power I would issue an order to prevent altogether distillation for drinking purposes. I would vote with any man that during this war not one bushel of corn or rye should be used for the manufacture of whisky. There should be no more of that common, miserable stuff which has a name in my country that I will not repeat; there should be no more of that dreadful poison which is damaging so many of our soldiers and officers, and I may say damning their souls. It should not lead to disasters in the future of which it is alleged to have been the cause in the past. It has been attributed to General Meade that he would have achieved a victory in the last campaign if it had not been for the drunkenness of one of his corps commanders. It has been stated in the public prints that when a corps commander was ordered to move he was too drunk to understand, or that he was too much incapacitated to execute the order by reason of drunkenness. The fact has gone to the country. I think, therefore, that it would render the public service essential aid if the production of whisky was reduced or stopped altogether.

Mr. KELLEY. It seems to me that justice to a very worthy officer renders it proper for me to say that the fact which the gentleman indorses is no fact at all. The whole story is denied, and the character of General French, the officer alluded to, has been fully vindicated.

Mr. GRINNELL. I thank the gentleman for his interruption. I wish to do injustice to no one. I did not mention any name. If it be not true as I have stated, it still does not militate against the position which I assume, that whisky has been of great injury to the service. It has been stated that high officers of the military department have been incapacitated from duty because of drunkenness. I cannot only call the name of one, but of many who have informed me that such is the fact. This evil, then, is one which affects both officers and soldiers; and I would raise the tax upon whisky, and of course the price, so high that it could not be brought within the reach of the soldiers. The Government should supply their real wants.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am really in earnest in this matter. I would not care if the constituents of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOON] never obtained another drink of whisky. [Laughter.] If that were to be the case, I think that we would soon have a political reformation in his district. [Laughter.] I would have his constituents, when they stretch their necks for a drink to-night, stretch them long, knowing that it would be their last villainous drink. It is true that a gentleman must make an argument for his own constituents, and that the gentleman from New York takes care of his. But I have no such friends to propitiate. I know that it was said liquor was poured out by the barrel against me in my district during the last election. Thank God, I have no desire to belong to a party that cannot come into power except upon a whisky barrel. [Laughter.] I believe that when whisky is abolished morals will flourish. I do not know what will become of the gentleman's party when whisky has been done away with, and I do not care.

If the war is to continue we must have revenue; we must have high excise duties, and a high tariff. The gentleman said that if the rebels had control of the Government they would not ask us to do more than we are now doing. There is difference of opinion about that. I say, without disrespect to the gentleman, that the verdict of the country is against him and with us. We have a President who has inaugurated a policy that alike promises freedom to the land and to put down the rebels in the dust where they ought to go. The people have answered the cavils of the gentleman and his party.

He does not suppose that confiscation will bring the war to a close. I think that it will, with glorious fighting. I would have, too, the reduction of the manufacture and of the consumption of whisky. If men will drink, make them pay for it. If they will get drunk, let them not call upon me to lie down with them in the ditch. It is an old adage that those who lie down with dogs will rise up with fleas. [Laughter.] We do not propose to have whisky to carry an election. We can do without it. All that we want is God and the flag and our glorious soldiers. We carried the election in Iowa, where the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOON] did not choose to fill his appointments, against the hero of Fort Donelson by thirty-two thousand majority; he, unfortunately, having gone into the wrong pew. [Laughter.] So much for that.

I hope sincerely, Mr. Chairman, that the tax will be increased to $1.20 per gallon. If it be objected that there will be smuggling, I would appoint other custom-house officers, and have them stationed every mile on the northern border, in order to keep out the whisky, and to secure sober officers and soldiers. And I would put a stop to the consumption of that miserable whisky that is so much used for the purpose of making modern Democrats on election and other days.

Mr. CHANLER. Looking at this as a matter of revenue, I congratulate the gentleman who has taken his seat, who, for the purpose of supporting the Administration to which he belongs, proposes to increase the tax and to deprive the people of the consumption of this article. He proposes to increase the tax and to prevent the people from drinking spirituous liquors. A most wonderful Solomon in his day and generation! The gentleman wishes a sober army—probably he alludes to Chancellorsville. He leaves the officers out, and alludes to the privates. Sir, the intoxication of our generals has been the curse of this country. But the spirit which actuated the gentleman is not of the wine-press. He is not drunk with spirit, but with blood. Fanaticism can easily divine an argument which deprives a poor man of the necessities of life, and which the gentleman admitted was a necessity of life. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means asserted, in reply to my colleague from New York the other day—and it is the principle upon which this Administration advances the tax upon spirituous liquors—that “the poor devils will drink it, and they shall pay for it.” Who pays for it? The men whose weary toil by day and night supports the fabric of the nation. Never, since man has labored, has he been able to sustain human toil from the rising to the setting sun without the use of that which God himself provided on the tree that grows, and on the vine which shades its grateful juice, to stimulate him in his labor, in the discharge of his duty, to relieve the sufferings of his body and the agony of his spirit. Can you administer to the mind diseased by an argument such as yours? Can you stimulate him to noble deeds while you refuse him what you have admitted as a necessity in his daily life? In other words, until you become temperate in argument, it little becomes you to criticize intemperance in daily life.

You have pointed with scorn at the corner groceries. Sir, I do not know in this country of any aristocratic corner, unless it be in that section whence the honorable gentleman, with his high-born air, comes. The gentleman has a style peculiar to himself, and while he chooses to be personal with those who live on corners, perhaps he would dislike to have them personally criticize the style and color of his cravat.

Mr. GRINNELL. I will take off my cravat if it offends the gentleman.

Mr. CHANLER. If you are prejudiced against one man's taste, why may they not be prejudiced against yours, if it is a mere matter of taste? The language of the gentleman in assailing those with whom he never associated is, according to all principles of human logic, intemperate if not unjust. If he ever met a gentleman in the corner groceries of my district he would learn good manners; certainly he would learn not to abuse absent men. If he did, he would go home a wiser if not a well punished man.

But this is wandering from the subject. I would like to call the attention of the House to a nobler and a higher theme. It is this: that there stalks through every great city the gaunt wolf of hunger and distress, and this spirit of undue taxation is the spirit of tyranny. I speak now not for the corner grocery, but for every poor distressed creature whom necessity, with cruel hand, has driven into the fortifications of civilized life—the cities. I speak for Philadelphia, founded by the philanthropy of Penn; I speak for Boston, the seat of Attic wit; I speak for St. Louis, the nursery of the civilization of the West; I speak for Cincinnati, and for every city west, southeast, and south. I say that while you sit here and legislate with undue severity in reference to those articles which the chairman of the Ways and Means admitted, and which the eloquent gentleman of the red cravat [Mr. GRINNELL] also admitted, the people must have, and when you force them to pay a burdensome taxation for what you know they must have, you are calling up from the depths of life in the cities a resistance to your Government, which, if your memory travels back to 1775, you will find has written its record from Lexington to Utah. Undue taxation is tyranny. Though Dr. Johnson may have written pamphlets to show that taxation is no tyranny, Bunker Hill answered him to the loss of his country. You tax, according to the revenue bill brought into this House, the beverages that pass the poor man's lips, the clothes he wears, every article of food and every necessity of life. And why do you stop short in your aggressive system? Why not go further and impose a tax upon the gray tombstone? Indeed, by taxing spirituous liquors, you absolutely do tax the embalmed body. You leave nothing within the whole scope of your legislation which is not unreasonably, enormously, and unnecessarily taxed.

The only argument I have heard advanced here on this question is that of necessity. I believe that, in view of the oppressive character of this system of taxation, that is the only argument that can be advanced in its justification. But to support that necessity, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, refers us to the taxation system of England. That honorable gentleman on more than one occasion has shown a prescient mind. He has the credit of having anticipated his party, and certainly in his position as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in advancing the interests of his own State, he has anticipated every member upon this floor. But here is a new position. A new light casts its shadow over the history of this country; and the finger of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means points to the system of English taxation for American imitation. Are the operatives of Lancashire, the colliers and the miners of England, and the other classes of oppressed operatives of that country to be brought forward and placed by the side of those who have escaped from that system of tyranny and oppression, and are living in the hope that this is a free country, where human labor may toil on to the grave without being taxed into degradation?

Does the gentleman mean to call up around us all the horrors of the system that now exists in England? Has he been deaf to the arguments of Cobden and Bright as to the injustice inflicted on the laboring classes in England by heavy taxation, and as to the ruin brought on them by the stoppage of cotton importation? The arrest of the cotton-spinning wheels of Manchester is ruin to the labor of England, but were it not for the superincumbent weight of taxation the injury to the cotton interest could not produce such widespread misery. Look at this country as compared with England. Judging from the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, who has given us such a hopeful view of affairs, and from the message of the President of the United States, who is now prospecting for peace, and judging from every other element around us, I think we have reason to be proud of the position in which we stand. We present the spectacle of a people, unburdened with taxation, coming forward willingly with every thing necessary to the support of the Government and carrying it triumphantly through the most trying crisis in our history. But reverse the picture. Conceive the case of the people being burdened with taxation, of distinctions being made between the rich and the poor, of a feeling of class antipathy, and then imagine what would have been our position. Your national Treasury would be exhausted. The people would refuse to meet your demands in men and money. I believe that this system, if it goes on, will provoke the people to resist it. I believe that they will refuse under it to march forward in advance, because it is not only aggressive but progressive, and leaves the people without spirit and without hope.

Mr. KELLEY. I had not intended, Mr. Chairman, to take part in this debate, and I am not yet very clear as to whether the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] shall receive my vote. I am very much in the habit of following the recommendation of committees of this House, especially when they present, as the Committee of Ways and Means has done in this case, a unanimous report. But really the arguments of gentlemen on the other side are almost persuading me that I should for once deviate from my rule. Before proceeding to examine the argument of the gentleman who has just been heard, [Mr. CHANLER,] permit me to allude for a moment to that of the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.]

He tells us that we might as well hope to make the conscription law and the confiscation law stable as hope to make any other of the laws the friends of the Administration may pass, and especially the one now under consideration, stable. The gentleman has not comprehended, I think, the scope of the conscription or the confiscation law one whit better than he seems to have comprehended the era in which we live.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I did not include the conscription law in my remarks, but I do now.

Mr. KELLEY. I understood the gentleman from New York to include the conscription law and the confiscation law, and to speak of them and of the other unconstitutional laws which he says we have passed; and so he now does. Sir, these laws are necessarily but temporary. We mean to, and if the rebels do not receive sufficient encouragement from gentlemen on this floor we will, before one year crush out the rebellion. The conscription law will have then done its work, and will lie a dead letter on our statute-book. If the war lasts longer than this year it will be by reason of the free and effective use of the most powerful weapon in the armory of the rebel leader, the eloquence of his friends on this floor; and when it terminates the confiscation law will also have executed its purpose and will be a dead letter on our statute-book. They are laws for the times. They are laws to suppress and punish the existing rebellion.

The last gentleman who addressed the committee [Mr. CHANLER] told us that poverty and gaunt want stalk through the streets of Philadelphia and other northern cities; and he ascribes it to taxation. I deny this allegation, and I challenge the observation of gentlemen, I challenge the records of our savings banks, I challenge the number of houses being built in every town and city in the North, to prove that there never was a season of greater prosperity than now. Gaunt want does stalk through the streets of our cities. It is not begotten of taxation, though, but of intemperance. The hungry wife who watches day after day and night after night for the husband to whom she gave her young love, and gathers to her exhausted breast the hungry babe, complains not of taxation, but that her wretched husband loiters in the school-house of modern Democracy—the corner groggery.

Mr. CHANLER. Has the member ever been there?

Mr. KELLEY. I have been near enough the doors of such places to see how they affect the habits and manners of those who may once have been gentlemen. I have sat nine years and nine months as judge of a court which had criminal jurisdiction over a population of over six hundred thousand people, and I tell the gentleman that had it not been for groggeries, the school-houses of modern Democracy, my business in the criminal department would have been diminished eight or nine tenths.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I understand the gentleman was elected as judge by the Democratic vote.

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir, I was elected by the people. I had the honor, so I have heard said, to have the Democracy find me too pure for their purposes, [laughter,] and their nominating convention threw me overboard, when the people took me up, and elected me by such a majority as no candidate for local office had ever received in the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will my colleague allow me to ask him how he secured his nomination for the judgeship—whether he did not write a letter pledging himself to abide the decision of a Democratic convention, and whether he did not subsequently repudiate that pledge?

Mr. KELLEY. I refer the gentleman to the groggeries of the fourth ward of the city of Philadelphia for the information he so earnestly desires. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; and they have got a better representative upon this floor than you are. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is not poverty caused by taxation that enables gentlemen to point to the destitution in our cities; it is to the influence of that poison which never was found on vine or tree coming fresh from the hand of God, as the gentleman [Mr. CHANLER] alleged; it is the product of man, the excessive use of which is denounced by divine authority, and the voice of those of our own poor race who have spoken most like God.

The gentleman, unfortunately for his argument, referred to the laboring classes of England: will he tell me whether he has seen—and if he has not it will afford me pleasure to send him a copy—a little book entitled “The Social Condition of the English People?” It is portions of a report made by Mr. Joseph Kay, an English gentleman, who was commissioned by the senate of Cambridge University, England, to travel widely and examine and report upon the social condition of the poorer classes of society.

Mr. CHANLER. If the gentleman refers to me, I beg to say that as my remarks upon this subject were founded upon a statement made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I will transfer my right to the gentleman's report on whisky to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. If he will send it to him he may find it of benefit. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. I will send a copy to both, if the gentlemen desire it. Mr. Kay went among the poor laborers of the British islands, and he reports having found an amount of poverty, ignorance, brutality, and general degradation that is almost inconceivable. And he tells the philanthropists, taxpayers, and Government of England that they must for their own safety, among other remedial measures, stop one fountain and open freely another; they must stop the ever-abounding supply of intoxicating drinks which flows along the borders of all their streets, and open up generously throughout the islands a system somewhat like our northern system of public education.

The gentleman asks whether we mean that the laborers who emigrate, believing that they are escaping from the oppressions of over-taxed England, shall come here to find that labor is even more grievously burdened by taxation? No, sir, we mean to give the Government all the revenue it requires to put an Army in the field larger, if need be, than any it has had, to enlarge and improve its Navy, and thus enable it to crush out this rebellion and establish a country in which the laborer, be he white or be he black, shall own himself, and shall have a legal title not only to his wife and child but to every day and every hour of his toil. That is what we mean to do for the laborer. Sir, we mean to make this broad country of ours, sweeping from ocean to ocean, from the wintry lakes on the north to that Gulf over whose surface the summer breezes ever linger, the home of freedom, the land in which labor shall be honored and adequately rewarded, the sure refuge and happy dwelling-place of the exile from any land. And while we keep this end in view we need not fear that the people will complain of taxation.

Why, who believes that the mother and father who have given their first, second, and third-born sons to the grave, that wives who have willingly consented to their widowhood and the orphanage of their children, will halt in their devotion to their country and freedom for the laborer, because taxation is one or five per cent., more or less? The gentleman does not know the people of the North. When he becomes acquainted with them he will find that the last able-bodied boy and the last dollar will be cheerfully sacrificed that our march may be steadily forward for liberty and the Union.

I shall not vote for the amendment of the gentleman. It is a revenue measure, not one of municipal police. I would willingly vote for an increase of the rate of taxation on whisky had it been recommended by the committee which reported this bill, and who have considered the subject with great care. The members of the committee say that a higher rate might diminish revenue, and I will not set my wishes against their judgment. I would, if I could, raise the price of whisky, and I would increase the rates of our tariff to correspond with the increased internal tax. I would follow the example of England in one thing, at least, that of taxing luxuries, and embrace brandy and wines. I would increase the duty upon them all, and make the luxurious people who enjoy high-priced wines contribute largely to the revenue of the country. If perchance I should thus withhold from one weary workman his needed stimulant, the prayers of drunkards' wives and children would, I think, relieve me from responsibility in the final account.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, this bill was made the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The debate has degenerated very far from what may be deemed the legitimate course which it ought to take. I insist that the discussion shall hereafter be confined to the merits of the bill as a special order. I was unwilling to arrest debate at the time, especially when we were enlightened by the statesmanship of the other side and the eloquence of this. I propose, therefore, that the committee rise for the purpose of closing general debate, and that we may have the five minutes debate provided for by the rules.

Before I submit that motion, however, let me say that I do not agree with the gentlemen who have proposed amendments.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Let me withdraw my amendment, and in lieu of it offer another one. I presume that there will be no objection.

Mr. STEVENS. An amendment has been proposed to the gentleman's amendment, and it is not therefore within his power to withdraw his amendment. Mr. Chairman, whenever the Committee of Ways and Means and this Congress shall assemble and act for the mere purpose of passing sumptuary laws to prohibit the production of whatever may be considered injurious to everybody, it may be possible to carry out the idea of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL,] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY,] I am not sure even that the amendments would have the effect desired; for as I said before, I am not sure that any amount of taxes will reduce the consumption of the article in question. If the argument of the gentleman from Illinois be true, I do not know but that instead of this being a revenue bill the result would be to decrease the revenue. You would then take from the Government the means of supporting the burdens which it is now compelled to bear.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Allow me a single moment. I wish the gentleman from Pennsylvania to recollect that I considered it as a revenue measure, and in no other light.

Mr. STEVENS. I am now speaking especially with reference to the argument of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LOVEJOY. You said Illinois.

Mr. STEVENS. I referred to both as having offered amendments.

Mr. Chairman, I should be glad if legislation could cure intemperance, but I have seen it tried, and tried in vain. I do not believe that sumptuary laws ever had any effect to stop abuses in any country. When I was a young man, and I would not object to being so again, I was in a State Legislature, and moved that the sale of liquor should be prohibited in my district, and the motion was carried. I did not find that I thereby made one drunkard the less—they would only drink the more when they had a chance. There is no other way than by moral suasion for the reformation of the world on the subject of drunkenness. But that is not the question now before us.

Since this article will be used, Mr. Chairman, how can we raise from it the most revenue? I think the tax of sixty cents per gallon is about the point where we will get revenue without being injurious to any branch of business. If it were desirable to stop the growth of corn in the western country, if it were for the interest of Iowa, or of Illinois, or of Ohio to prohibit by this means the raising of that article, perhaps I might go for the amendment which the gentleman has proposed. I believe there is more corn raised in that country than can be used for fattening hogs or cattle, and therefore it should be used for fattening, not hogs, but men. [Laughter.]

I am opposed to the amendment. I do not know whether eighty cents per gallon would reduce the revenue; but it would bear unreasonably upon that branch of business that needs spirits. Therefore I am against it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] stated that this might overturn the Government and the Administration before the rebellion was suppressed, very much to the grief of that eloquent gentleman I have no doubt. I am therefore for sustaining the committee in the action they have taken, and I should be sorry to see it changed.

As I do not intend to go into a political discussion, I will move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Is it the gentleman's intention to cut off amendments to the bill?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; nor proper explanation of them.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the amendment to the internal revenue law, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that when the committee again resume consideration of this bill, general debate thereon be closed in one minute thereafter. The bill will then be open to five minute debate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the revenue bill.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate will be closed in one minute.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I withdraw my amendment and move to amend by striking out from line ten the words "sixty cents on each and every gallon," and inserting the following:

Forty cents per gallon on all manufactured before the passage of the act, and upon which duties have not been paid; also upon all which may be manufactured before the 1st of May, 1864, and upon all manufactured after the 1st of May and before the 1st day of July, 1864, a duty of sixty cents; and on all manufactured after the 1st of July, 1864, a duty of one dollar per gallon.

I have simply to say, in reference to this matter, that I have looked upon it simply as a question of revenue, and not of morals or of temperance; and I am satisfied that is the only legitimate view we can take of it here. We are attempting to raise a revenue, and I understand from the very best authority that those who are to be affected by this act, and who have been affected by previous similar acts, have been prompt in their response to the claims of the Government, and have paid the duties Congress imposed upon them. I am not particular as to the rate of the tax. If one dollar is too much, I am willing it should be sixty or eighty cents; but this one thing I hope will be done, that we shall put it at such a figure that we shall not be called upon to change it hereafter, and subject these men to constant annoyance and uncertainty. Whether the manufacture is a moral or an immoral one, the question is, what is just, when we propose to tax the manufacturer. We all understand perfectly well that the most desirable thing in legislation is that it should be of a permanent character, in order that those who are to be affected by it may know that it is not to be changed. I do not know whether the committee have come to the conclusion in their own minds that sixty cents is the maximum tax. Very likely before the close of this session, if not this session then the next, they may come back and say we should put on twenty or forty cents more. All I ask is that we shall fix upon some sum and there leave it, for I do not think it just, after the manufacturer has purchased the raw material for manufacture, that we should turn round and spring a new law upon him, and make it apply to what he has already manufactured. This law is made to operate against those who have distilled and have happened not to pay the duty of twenty cents. If a man has purchased and paid the twenty cents, he has the benefit of the rise; while the original manufacturer, because he happens to have it on hand at the time, must pay this additional duty.

Mr. STEVENS. The committee, in their bill, have said "or may have made a return," supposing all had made returns tri-monthly. We find, however, that many have not, and therefore the committee have agreed upon an amendment to meet that state of the case, and it will be offered by some member of the committee.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Then I understand the committee propose to exempt all which the distillers have on hand, and that obviates the difficulty I had in my mind.

I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this is not a sumptuary question, but simply a question of justice toward these men from whom we propose to derive the revenue. I think they are entitled to know that the law shall be permanent, and then their business will adjust itself to the tax which is established. If the committee think my amendment does not carry the rate too high, I should be glad to have them concur in it. If, after considering the subject, they shall say that sixty cents is the ultimate maximum, I shall be content to stop there; but if they think it will hereafter have to be raised above that, I hope that will be done now.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Has the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] withdrawn his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. He withdrew his original amendment, but offered another in lieu of it.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to say that the explanation made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means obviated the necessity of his amendment, and that he withdrew it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is still pending.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Then I only desire to say with reference to that amendment that I think it is objectionable on the ground that it makes too many classifications in the operation of the law. I think that we have been disappointed in the amount of revenue collected under this excise by the difficulty of making the assessment and collection under the law. If revenue is the object it is desirable that we should simplify it as much as possible, so that the officers of the Government may have no difficulty in levying the taxes and preventing any deception. It strikes me that the only objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is that it will necessarily lead to confusion which will enable very large quantities of the article which we propose to tax to escape from the operation of the law.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois by striking out all of it after the words "strike out sixty cents and insert," and inserting in lieu thereof "fifty cents;" and I will state briefly my object in doing so.

I agree with gentlemen upon the other side of the House that this is purely a question of revenue, and that we cannot go into the question of the morality or immorality of the liquor trade. By the very fact that the Government undertakes to derive an income from the trade they acknowledge it to be legitimate. We want a permanent tax on this article, and one that will not be so high as to interfere with the profit which the Government expects to derive from it; but I see in the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois that which will produce the very evils of which he complains. We have tried a tax of twenty cents on the gallon, and it seems to me that if, in this experiment as to how much tax a particular branch of industry will bear, we increase the amount one hundred and fifty per cent., we are making a sufficient strike at one time. The maxim festina lente applies in legislation as well as in other things, and we may by over-greed defeat the very object we have in view. I do think that if, instead of a tax of sixty cents, or the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, we impose a permanent tax of fifty cents, we shall be increasing the amount of taxation on this article sufficiently at the present time.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. LOVEJOY's amendment.

Mr. COFFROTH. Is an amendment now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. COFFROTH. Then I offer as an amendment to the amendment what I send to the Clerk's desk, to come in after line thirty-five of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois relates to a preceding portion of the section.

Mr. COFFROTH. Then I will offer it as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps it would not be germane to that.

Mr. COFFROTH. If the Chair will hear it read he will be better able to decide that question.

The proposed amendment was read, as follows:

Provided further, That no return of liquor distilled need be made to the collector or deputy collector by any distiller under thirty days unless the amount distilled exceeds five hundred gallons.

The CHAIRMAN. That is in order as an amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois by striking out that part of it which provides for a tax of forty cents on all the whisky that may have been manufactured prior to the passage of this act.

I only desire to say, in connection with this proposition, that the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means does not propose to impose this additional tax upon spirits manufactured prior to the time when this bill was introduced. The forty-fourth section of the act of 1862 expressly authorizes the manufacturer to store up manufactured spirits in a warehouse provided for that purpose, and he is not required to pay the duty on the spirits so stored until it is removed for sale. The only effect of that portion of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois which I propose to strike out is to impose the additional tax of twenty cents per gallon on spirits which have been stored in conformity with the provisions of the forty-fourth section of the original act; and I take it for granted that such a monstrous injustice will not be tolerated for a moment.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] because I am opposed to the whole amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. I suppose that our object in levying a tax at this time is to obtain revenue, and to obtain it in a fair and legitimate mode. The proposition to tax whatever quantity may be on hand which has not been subjected to a tax is, in my view, wholly impracticable. Gentlemen on the other side who are so loud in their denunciations of the army of tax-gatherers necessary for the collection of the internal revenue would then have real occasion to exclaim against the numbers whom that would necessitate. Unless there should be inspectors in every town and village it would not be collected.

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to increasing the tax, because I am satisfied that the rate of sixty cents per gallon will yield as much revenue as any higher rate would yield. I believe that that is the utmost verge of taxation which this article will now bear. The annual product of the country, when reduced to proof, is, in round numbers, one hundred million gallons. We export something less than ten million gallons; and I suppose it is fair to say that the manufactures and arts consume nearly ten million gallons more. But for some considerable length of time there has been no exportation of spirits; and whatever has been distilled beyond the consumption of the country has accumulated. The larger share of it is in the hands of speculators; but you can no more reach that speculation than you can reach the speculation in gold, or in any other commodity. It is not the distillers who are to be blamed for this speculation in whisky. So far as I can learn, the facts are that they have paid their taxes as honorably and fairly as any other class in the country.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I desire to state to the gentleman from Vermont that he is mistaken as to the object of my amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. My remarks apply to the proposed tax of a dollar per gallon after the 1st of July, 1864. It is a fact, Mr. Chairman, that up to the 1st of November the distillers did not make a dollar on anything that they distilled prior to that time. All the profits of the distillers were on what they had on hand. But for the advantage derived by them from having small stocks on hand, their business would have had to be wound up. And still I have been informed that for two thirds of the year they have been idle. I, for one, do not propose that we shall create a revolution in that business, so as to deprive the country of all revenue from it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question was taken on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the amendment, pro forma, by striking out "forty" and inserting in lieu thereof "forty-five cents per gallon." Without professing to be very familiar with the principles of the bill, I recognize that much has been said here to-day which in my judgment would come appropriately under the general head of buncombe, having little or no application to the subject before the committee.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not speaking to his amendment.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Perhaps I may reach it in the course of time, if the gentleman will have a little patience.

The CHAIRMAN. The rules require gentlemen to confine their remarks to the amendment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed in order.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I have in my possession, but not here in the House, a letter from a plain, practical, common-sense constituent of mine, containing suggestions as to this act which would answer all the buncombe that we have heard to-day in regard to the cruelty of the provisions of the bill now pending. In order that the committee may have the benefit of the wise suggestions contained in that letter, I propose to move that the committee do now rise and that then the House adjourn.

The question being on the amendment to the amendment,

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, withdrew it, and moved that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to amend by striking out "one dollar," where it occurs in the amendment, and inserting in lieu thereof "sixty cents."

I look upon this bill as reported, and upon the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Illinois for the purpose of increasing the revenue of the Government, as oppressive to the people of the western and northwestern States. At the same time, from what I have already heard from the Committee of Ways and Means, and from gentlemen upon the other side of the House, I presume that we shall have to accept something very nearly like what the committee have reported. For the purpose, therefore, of bringing the provision back as nearly as possible to the original bill, I move to strike out "one dollar" and insert "sixty cents."

Mr. CLAY. I desire to offer an amendment as an additional section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order. There is an amendment to an amendment pending.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD moved to amend by striking out the last provision in the section, as follows:

Provided further, That all spirits on hand for sale, or removed for consumption or sale, upon which no duties have been paid or collected, and upon which no returns have been made, whether distilled prior to the date of this act or not, shall be subject to the duty provided by this act from and after the 12th day of January, 1864.

And to insert in lieu thereof as follows:

Provided further, That all spirits on hand and for sale, whether distilled prior to the date of this act or not, shall be subject to the rates of duty provided by this act, from and after the 12th day of January, 1864, except that such spirits as shall have been already taxed under the law approved July 17, 1863, shall not pay more than the additional increased tax provided for by this act.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. This is the amendment to which I referred when this subject was before the committee the other day. Its effect, if adopted, would be to make this proposed tax operative upon all spirits wherever found, including, so far as the forty cents increased tax is concerned, the whisky now in the hands of speculators and forestallers, as they say in New York, the same who, having some intuitive perception as to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury and the action of Congress, have anticipated this law, and by the might of their capital have become monopolists. The effect of the amendment would therefore be to give a very large additional revenue to the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from New York whether the effect of his amendment will be to tax spirits in bonded warehouses, much of which is still owned by the distillers?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I will answer the gentleman from Indiana that there is another section in this bill which refers to this subject of spirits in bonded warehouses. The amendment which I propose makes no qualification in that respect, leaving the law as it now stands, by which the distiller gets the benefit of the drawback. But I propose that the merchant, whether wholesale or retail, shall come within its provisions; that whisky, whenever manufactured, wherever it is, in whosever possession it may be found, shall immediately on a day named, or whenever this bill shall become a law, pay a duty from which it can by no possibility escape.

That, sir, is the purpose of this provision. This article has been selected for the purpose of deriving a large revenue from it. There are now, it is estimated, twenty-five million gallons of whisky on hand in the country. If these twenty-five million gallons are subjected to this increased tax of forty cents it will produce at once a revenue of $10,000,000.

Again, the difficulty attending the operations of the excise tax respecting this article has been that the law was so complicated, so difficult of construction, that long before the officers appointed under the law could collect the tax, the holders managed to evade it. And one reason why an additional recommendation by the Secretary of the Treasury has been made was in consequence of that defect in the law. This amendment, therefore, has been drawn for the purpose of making the evading of the law more difficult. Whether it is used as a beverage, whether it is used by the manufacturers, whether held by the speculator, or the politician who has obtained information by which he expects to make money—wherever it can be found, it shall pay a tax.

Now, sir, it appears to me there is a necessity for a provision of this kind, that justice, simple justice to the man pursuing the honest avocation of his trade, requires it; that it is due to that class, and a very large class, of persons whom it will thus affect, that the provisions of this bill should be placed where they cannot easily be evaded.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NOBLE. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] by adding the following:

And provided further, That manufacturers shall not be required to pay any additional tax over and above the amount imposed by the act of 1863, upon any spirits manufactured by them prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment as being in strict accordance with the principles adopted by the committee in exempting from taxation that which was manufactured prior to the passage of the act of 1863. As I understand this bill the committee do not propose to tax any spirits with any additional tax which may be manufactured prior to 1862, simply because that act did not impose any tax upon them. By the act of 1863 a certain tax was imposed upon all that might be manufactured thereafter. Manufacturers have gone into business under that law in good faith, and have gone on manufacturing this article. Many of them, I may say, have entered into contracts for the purpose of supplying it at a given price, fixed necessarily according to the tax then imposed. Now if this bill is to tax the manufacturer under his contract, I want to know whether it does not strike at his rights? Would it not strike him down to do that? It was not the intention certainly of the committee to strike at the existence of an important class of manufacturers. It was not the intention of the committee, certainly, to prevent these men from filling their contracts made in good faith and based upon the law of 1862, by making this bill retroactive, which it is as it now stands.

I propose by my amendment that the spirits manufactured up to the date of the passage of this act shall not bear this additional tax. Any other principle makes the law retroactive, and, as I have shown, will interfere with contracts already made. I hope that the amendment to the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I had desired to make some few remarks on the general policy of this bill, but since the adoption of the resolution by the House of the gentleman from Pennsylvania cutting off all but the five minutes debate, I will suggest only one or two leading questions involved in the amendment before the committee.

There are but two questions, really and plainly, in this bill: the one is the amount of tax to be charged upon these spirits; and the other is the description of spirits to which this rate shall be applied. As to the first question, there is a single consideration, which is that of revenue for the Government, combined with readiness and facility for the collection of the tax. The Committee of Ways and Means, after listening to a debate hour after hour from parties interested, have fixed the rate of taxation at sixty cents per gallon. I shall adhere to that action of the committee, although I was of the opinion that it should be placed at a higher figure. As I have said, I shall adhere to the action of the committee.

As to the description of property to which it should be applied, I object to the principles suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY.] The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NOBLE] suggests that injustice is done to this species of property by variation of taxes. This Congress has the right to advance the rate of tax according to the emergency of the country. Every citizen who has property holds it subject from year to year to taxes for the support of the Government. This year it must be one rate, and next year another rate. Persons engaged in commercial transactions in reference to this article of spirits have accumulated a stock beyond the demand for it, and to adopt the amendment of the gentleman would give them the advantage of the advance in price after the increase of the tax.

I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] in respect to a principle of his own amendment, that there should be a tax upon all property which has been held over. Whether that tax should be imposed to the whole extent that the committee proposes to impose upon that manufactured in the future, or one half of that rate, I am not prepared to express an opinion. But I trust that the committee will regard the history of British legislation on this subject. It commenced in 1791 with a tax of three shillings, and went on to twelve shillings, when it was reduced to ten shillings, where it now stands. The revenue on this article with a progressive rate of taxes has largely increased, showing that a reasonable rate of taxes progressing from year to year, though it results in changing what the gentleman from Illinois regards as the necessary permanency, has not reduced but rather stimulated production. I say that we have the right to arrange the taxes according to the emergency of the country. I have some statistics which I have collected on this subject, which, however, I shall be unable to present to the House for want of time.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise. We have arrived at the usual hour for adjournment, and as we have now before us a very important amendment, it may be proper to take time for consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 22, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 18.

bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

WAR EXPENSES OF NEW YORK.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to reimburse the city of New York for expenses incurred in the outfit of troops to aid in suppressing the present rebellion; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to ask the gentleman whether his bill refers to the troops sent to Pennsylvania, to which allusion was made the other day. If it does, I will tell the gentleman that every one of them has already been paid.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. No, sir; it refers to all the troops which have been raised by New York since April, 1861.

The motion to refer the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means was agreed to.

REFUNDING DUTIES ON CERTAIN ARMS.

Mr. STEBBINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to remit and refund certain duties on arms imported and purchased by the State of New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PAY OF CHAPLAINS.

Mr. GRINNELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend section nine of the act of Congress of July, 1862, relative to the pay of chaplains; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ATLANTIC MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. CHANLER, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the petition of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company in respect to funds taken by military order at New Orleans, and forwarded to the United States Treasury, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

MILITARY WAGON ROAD IN MICHIGAN, ETC.

Mr. DRIGGS asked unanimous consent to introduce a bill granting lands to the State of Michigan for the construction of a wagon road for postal and military purposes in that State.

Mr. LOVEJOY objected.

And then, on motion of Mr. LOVEJOY, (at four o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 20, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of State, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, a copy of the report on the resources of the United States, made by Samuel B. Ruggles, and presented to the International Statistical Congress, at Berlin, in September last; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed. A motion of Mr. ANTHONY, that fifteen hundred additional copies of the report be printed, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COWAN presented the memorial of Darius Skidmore and nineteen others, praying for relief as against the operation of the new patent law, approved March 3, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I present a petition from a large number of Germans in Boston regarding the proclamation of amnesty and the plan of reconstruction contained in the last presidential message. They state several objections to that plan of reconstruction; but all of them more or less seem to center in one to this effect:

"that it enables the enemies of the Republic directly to revive slavery, which is the cause of the war;" and they conclude by calling upon Congress "to take hold of reconstruction, and in such a way as to secure the abolition of slavery forever, the avoidance of a landed aristocracy by including the confiscated lands under the homestead bill, by free education for the negroes and the uneducated white people, and also by other arrangements which will make the rebels politically harmless." As this subject has already, on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. TEN Eyck,] been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, I move the reference of this petition to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented the petition of Alfred M. Delavan, praying for remuneration for property destroyed, as he alleges, by Federal soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HENDERSON presented the petition of William H. Wood and George Wood, praying for indemnity for losses of property caused by the Army of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARLAN presented the petition of George Bailey, praying for a modification of the existing patent laws; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the memorial of Joseph Ford, of Northfield, Rice county, Minnesota, praying for the passage of an act allowing him to enter certain lands in Rice county, Minnesota, under the act of Congress entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers upon the public domain;" which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HOWE presented a memorial of two hundred and sixty citizens of the towns of Harmony and Milton, Rock county, in the State of Wisconsin, tendering their thanks to Congress and to the President for the various measures taken to suppress the rebellion, and praying that still more efficient measures may be taken to that same end, and especially that colored soldiers may be put upon the same footing as to pay and privileges with white soldiers, and that measures may be taken to make emancipation general; which was referred to the select committee on freedmen and slavery.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, praying that such action may be taken as shall result in securing a new treaty between the United States and Great Britain, founded upon the principles of reciprocity between the two Governments and the people of both countries, and which shall obviate the objections and inequalities existing in the present treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and a motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE that the memorial be printed, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

THE CONFIRMATION OF GENERAL SCHOFIELD.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I ask leave to submit to the Senate a memorial received from a large majority of the loyal members of the Missouri General Assembly, protesting against the confirmation by this body of the nomination of Brigadier General J. M. Schofield to the position of major general in the volunteer forces. It is in these words:

Protest from David Wagner and sixty-three other members of the Legislature of Missouri, against the nomination of John M. Schofield to be a major general in the volunteer forces of the United States.

JEFFERSON CITY, MISSOURI, December, 1863.

To the Honorable Senate of the United States:

The undersigned, members of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, do earnestly protest with your honorable body against the confirmation of Brigadier General J. M. Schofield as major general, for the reason that, during his command in this department, his influence and patronage have been partial, and favorable alone to the class commonly denominated "rebel sympathizers," and has been used against the truly loyal citizens, who have been loyal without a single hint or reproach of sympathy for pro-slavery treason or traitors. It has, moreover, associated himself with, and permitted his official influence and patronage to support that clique who are attempting to crush out the friends of the Union and liberty, and also to deprive the gallant Missouri soldiers in the Federal Army from their rightful expression as citizens in the exercise of the elective franchise—an outrage of the blackest character, and such deprivation attempted solely to fasten on an unwilling people a curse sought to be gotten rid of.

Can we, need we, offer stronger reasons to your honorable body to induce you to reject such confirmation?

We believe there yet remain a sufficient number of gallant and meritorious officers, deserving of promotion, without conferring honors on officers whose influence, when in power, has been given in favoring "rebel sympathizers" and those hostile to the Federal Government.

We claim to represent the undoubted loyal men of Missouri, and a party true to the principles and flag of the Union and freedom—a party sustained at the last State election by a majority of the loyal men of this State and NINETEEN TWENTY-TWO of the soldiers in the field. We have, moreover, almost without any favor or patronage from the General Government, and with the opposition of a corrupt State Government—corrupted by pro-slavery secession influences—fought this political contest, ever keeping the flag of freedom victorious.

We ask you to favorably consider our petition and protest.

This protest is signed by sixty-three Senators and Representatives—men of high character in their respective sections—who reflect the united loyal sentiment of the State as they recognize it, who stand in the presence of the very events of which they speak, and are personally cognizant of the maladministration charged. In the long struggle which has resulted in securing the adhesion of Missouri to the national cause, they have ever been in the front rank, staking all upon the issue, true among the truest.

The allegations set forth in the paper presented are to the effect that the military administration of General Schofield has been persistently and disgracefully favorable to rebel sympathizers and to the disloyal element in our population, at the expense of the friends of the Federal Government. It will be remembered that this officer was first left in command of the department of Missouri by General Halleck, and that he was removed from that position, after a short trial of his conduct of affairs, by the President, upon the application of a committee representing gentlemen of high standing in Missouri, charging him with disloyal practices, and with not giving a hearty support to the then struggling nation's cause. In preferring the present accusation, therefore, the members of our General Assembly only reiterate and affirm with additional intensity upon a second experience what was so forcibly represented in the first instance. It is a cumulative case of wrong, of evidence, of complaint. The modes in which outrage is alleged to have been perpetrated are various—exclusion from the service, from promotion and employment of all who had been marked by zeal or forwardness in behalf of the Government when it was a peril and not a payment to be so signalized; persecution of prominent citizens for their political faith in freedom; for the singing of a song or the cheering a victorious name; intimidation or suppression of loyal newspapers and arrest of their editors for criticising his tyrannies with too free a speech; consigning to the dungeons of a military prison, upon rebel accusation, gallant officers who had seen more battle-fields than he had ever gotten steps of undeserved promotion; and liberating of his own motion to dwell in the chief cities traitors convicted by military commission of smuggling quinine and correspondence to the enemy.

Touching the matter of the disfranchisement wrought through his instrumentality, or at least with his cognizance, upon the vote of the soldiers in the field, reference is had to the assumed military control of elections as respects judges, voters, and the disposition of troops under the sinister influences of a State organization resolute to retain power in defiance of the popular will. This specific feature of the arraignment is a political one, of which each must judge for himself, but they who object to such interference of the military arm on principle can scarcely indorse it, no matter to whose advantage exercised. That in this instance the power, with all accustomed and unaccustomed appliances, has been used against the party of freedom is proven by the very complaint itself. These gentlemen, loyal themselves to the Government of the nation, coworkers beside the Administration, would never make an issue with its military arm in their own State without cruel provocation. That fact carries its proof along with it. So much for the memorial of the loyal members of the Legislature whose names are signed to this document.

I now present, in connection with the same subject-matter, and in continuation of the arraignment, the protest of the more immediate Representatives in Congress of those who sustain the Administration and the Government in Missouri. Here is their statement and remonstrance:

Protest of BENJAMIN F. LOAN and others, Representatives in Congress from the State of Missouri, against the confirmation of the nomination of Major General Schofield.

Hon. HANNIBAL HAMLIN: We, the undersigned, representing truly loyal congressional districts, as well as the loyal citizens of the State of Missouri, on the floor of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, do, in the name of said districts and of the loyal citizens of said State, most solemnly protest against the confirmation of the rank of major general conferred, by appointment by his excellency the President of the United States, upon Brigadier General J. M. Schofield, and will ever protest, in their names, for the following reasons: the loyal citizens of the military department of Missouri, with ourselves, are not familiar with (or known to) any act of Brigadier General Schofield which merits even the rank he now holds. From the time General Halleck left St. Louis to take command of the army before Corinth, in the spring of 1862, until General Curtis assumed command of the department of the Missouri, about October, 1863, General Schofield, as district commander, had unlimited control of military affairs in Missouri, and his administration proved a most signal failure. Porter, in northeast Missouri, was allowed to collect, in the summer of 1863, a band of guerrillas numbering some five or six thousand, with which he ravaged the country and murdered the loyal citizens for long space of time.

Poindester, in the central part of the State, north of the Missouri river, had a similar band of about sixteen hundred, with which he committed all kinds of outrages on the loyal citizens. The southeast and southern border of Missouri were, for all practicable purposes, in the hands of the rebels. In August, Coffee, Cockrell, and others, were allowed to march a large force into the river counties on the west of the State, and defeated the Federal forces in the disastrous battle of Lone Jack, in which our loss was, in killed and wounded, very great. The rebels, after collecting a large number of recruits and conscripts and great quantities of booty, were allowed to retreat without serious loss.

On General Curtis's arrival in Missouri a change was effected at once. Vigorous measures for the prompt punishment of guerrillas, bushwhackers, and rebels, and their sympathizers, were adopted.

The enemy felt the necessity of changing their location, and loyal men began to realize that they were once more under the protecting influence of the flag of our country.

Shortly after General Curtis assumed command in Missouri, General Schofield, at his request, was relieved of the command of the district of Missouri and assigned to the command of the army of the frontier. This army was kept very active in marching and countermarching between Springfield, Missouri, and Fayetteville, Arkansas, and without any practical results, until indisposition compelled General Schofield to retire from the head of the army of the frontier and return to St. Louis. This providential interference resulted in the splendid victory of Prairie Grove, gained under the gallant lead of Major Generals Blunt and Herron, and which resulted in breaking up the organized rebel army in northwest Arkansas, and in driving most of its scattered fragments to the south of the Arkansas river. Perhaps disgusted with his want of success on the west side of the Mississippi river, it was understood that General Schofield, at his own request, was transferred to a command in the department of the Cumberland, where it was hoped his scientific acquirements, guided and directed by competent commanders, would prove beneficial to his country. It is not known that the hope was ever realized. Without any brilliant action to attract the attention of the country to General Schofield, and to the astonishment of all loyal men of the West, General Schofield, notwithstanding the non-action of the Senate upon his nomination to be major general, is called from the army of the Cumberland to supersede General Curtis, and to assume command over the field of his former failures. Generals Blunt and Herron, both of whom had won their promotion for gallantry on the field, and whose nominations as major generals had been confirmed by the Senate, were subordinated to this officer.

On assuming the command of the department, the quiet, peace, and order established by the judicious administration of General Curtis, and the sense of security felt by loyal and law-abiding citizens, entirely disappeared, and once more the rebels and sympathizers rejoiced in their triumph. Under his administration, Federal authority in Missouri was entirely subordinated to State rule, and the whole was directed by a policy in sympathy with rebels, and discriminating against the loyal sentiment of the State.

Under this administration Federal guns, as a general rule, in western Missouri, and it is believed throughout the State, have been intrusted to the hands of those in sympathy with the rebellion, to the almost entire exclusion of those of known loyalty. And one of the consequences resulting therefrom was, that a band of guerrillas, some fifteen hundred in number, penetrated to the city of Booneville, the geographical center of the State, murdering the citizens, and plundering, burning, and destroying property along their route. Another was the massacre and destruction of property at Lawrence—an act of fiendish atrocity and savage barbarity that cannot find a parallel in the annals of any country. It is true that General Schofield hastened to the vicinity of this cruel tragedy, and arrived without unnecessary delay; but it is not known, from any official report that has been made public, that any other or further action was taken than to so arrange the troops along the western boundary of Missouri as to furnish the protection to the guerrillas, as they retreated into Missouri, from the pursuing citizens of Kansas, who had hastily been assembled to avenge the foul crimes perpetrated upon their citizens and friends; and he telegraphed triumphantly, from the western border, to Lieutenant Governor Hall, that effectual means had been taken to prevent the invasion of Missouri by the citizens of Kansas. It is to be regretted that equal energy and zeal had not been shown to have kept Missouri guerrillas out of Kansas. In a word, General Schofield's administration in Missouri has resulted in misrule, discord, and confusion, and to the destruction of the best interests of the loyal people of the State. In fact, these outrages, wrongs, and injuries are so excessive that the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Missouri, now in session, have appointed a select committee, among other things, to investigate and report upon these wrongs and outrages. A report from this committee may be expected in about two weeks, at which time official information in relation to the military misrule in Missouri can be laid before the Senate.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

BENJ. F. LOAN,
J. W. MCCLURG,
S. H. BOYD,
HENRY T. BLOW.

The honorable gentlemen whose names are appended, and who so ably represent a large part of Missouri in the other branch of this Congress, have stated their grounds of complaint in language whose point, succinctness, and direct bearing I could not improve upon, and that I will not attempt to amplify. It will be sufficient to say, if I am correctly informed, that in regard to the part taken by General Schofield in the "marching and countermarching" in the Southwest, and for acts of omission and commission not necessary here to recite, he will be made the subject of charges preferred and a court martial demanded by a brother officer high in the confidence of the people of the West. To the other branch of this protest which relates to the arming of rebels and rebel sympathizers in Missouri, their enrollment into distinct companies, and their being intrusted with the keeping of watch and ward over their loyal neighbors, disarmed and disbanded, I wish to add a supplement. It is a communication united in by all the members of this Congress from the State of Iowa, representing that this terrorism has even crossed the border and disturbed the quietude of their own State. I will read it, that Senators may know how others of neighboring States, men of unbiased judgment, of pure standing, and large intelligence contemplate and regard this military administration of General Schofield in Missouri:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 8, 1864.

To the Loyal Delegation in Congress from the State of Missouri:

The undersigned, of the delegation from Iowa in Congress, and whose congressional districts border some three hundred miles upon the State of Missouri, have received information which gives them some alarm for the peace of the border. These representations, from responsible sources, are to the effect that known and notorious rebels, who had returned from the rebel armies into Missouri, had been furnished with arms under the authority of Governor Gamble or General Schofield, and actually organized into companies; and that such organizations are found in the counties dangerously near the State line of Iowa. A few border military companies exist in Iowa, under State authority, barely sufficient in number to keep the peace against rebel sympathizers on either side of the line. Some outrages have been already committed in the southern tier of counties in Iowa, indicating the continued existence of the rebel secret organizations. Our constituents are firmly of the opinion that the threatened danger is solely attributable to the existing regulations in Missouri, which keep parties, loyal and disloyal, anti-slavery and pro-slavery, so nearly balanced, and the latter so well armed, that affrays, robberies, and slaughter may at any time break forth, not only in Missouri, but across the border in our State. The feeling is such that in some border counties of Iowa, we are advised, petitions are circulating for the removal of General Schofield, to whom they assign the responsibility for this perilous condition of the coterminous territory.

We believe that permanent peace will not be established there until one party or the other in Missouri, pro-slavery or anti-slavery, disloyal or loyal, shall gain an acknowledged supremacy in authority and in numbers. We ask you, gentlemen, who have the right to be heard at Washington, to counsel incasures which will preserve order and law, where they can only be found, under the control of men who offer blood and treasure to save the country, not under the armed interference of men who have offered blood and treasure to destroy the country.

The feeling in our districts is increasing in intensity. Our people resent the indignity of arming again their old enemies on the border; and we warn, through you, the State you represent of the coming danger, if the enemy whom our troops have conquered at the front is sent to the rear only to be rearmd there to our greater peril.

We are, very respectfully, your obedient servants,
JOHN A. KASSON, Fifth District.
JAMES F. WILSON, First District.
J. B. GRINNELL, Fourth District.

The undersigned, being members of Congress from the State of Iowa, concur in the foregoing statements.

H. PRICE, Second District.
WILLIAM B. ALLISON, Third District.
A. W. HUBBARD, Sixth District.

A statement so full and so significant cannot, I am persuaded, be without its influence upon the minds of Senators. The arming of rebels and rebel sympathizers in Missouri on the ground that amnesty to them implies protection; that to return them and protect them in the sections desolated by their treason requires they should be armed in self-defense; that to arm them thus in the midst of a loyal population equally armed would result in conflict inevitably; that, therefore, to preserve the peace, it is further necessary to disarm the loyal population—all this may be very logical from the premises, but it has this one fatal defect, that it subordinates the rights and securities, the lives and the fortunes of the conquerors in this war to a futile, faithless conciliation of the men of treason.

One other matter deserves mention here. The days past have been few since an honorable Senator from Minnesota felt called upon to introduce a resolution in this body to elicit information and compel justice to soldiers of his State confined in jail at Jefferson City, under this same régime, and in pursuance of a kindred policy that would punish as a crime hostility to slavery in Missouri. The case is not an isolated one, as was well attested by the Senator from Kansas. The blue-eyed northern boy marching from his far-away home to confront a rebellion contending for mastery of the State—his heart aglow, perhaps, with traditions of freedom—finds transgression against the slave code visited with unrelenting harshness, while oblivion drapes a corresponding breach of the articles of war.

Mr. President, the pith and meaning of all this protest and memorializing is to ask that this honorable body, the Senate of the United States, famed for the prudence of its judgments and the self-reliance of its courses, will by no act in this connection give its indorsement to such a departmental military administration as has been set forth. The loyal people of Missouri have suffered and are still loyal; have been smitten where they should have met with caress; yet do not have it in contemplation to forego either their attachment to freedom or their support of the Government. They simply ask, and have asked continuously in the appropriate quarter, that even at this late day the remedy of a change may be applied; but above all and before all, in the memory of a long trial and in justice to an unquailing spirit, they demand that they shall not be now humiliated before this nation "with the advice and consent of the Senate," as would be done by the confirmation of this nomination.

Mr. President, having received these communications from the Representatives of the State in the General Assembly and the members of Congress in the other House both of my own State and of Iowa, and numberless letters of like tenor from various quarters, I have deemed it my duty that they should be presented to the Senate with the words of explanation with which I have accompanied them. I now submit them and move that they be laid on the table. I presume it is not necessary to print them, as they have already been printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

No. 20) extending the benefits of the bounty granted by the act of July 22, 1861, to certain soldiers who entered the service of the United States prior to May 3, 1861, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; which was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print fifteen hundred copies of the report of S. B. Ruggles on the resources of the United States, presented to the International Statistical Congress at Berlin in September last, reported in favor of printing the same.

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print five thousand extra copies of the report of General George B. McClellan, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the report of General George B. McClellan upon the operations of the army of the Potomac, recently communicated by the Secretary of War to the House of Representatives, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The amendment of the committee is to add the words:

Without the accompanying documents and maps.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That the papers of Caroline S. Williams, administratrix of Thomas P. Williams, praying for the extension of a patent, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

REFERENCE OF A COMMUNICATION.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Some time since I introduced a resolution, which was passed by the Senate, calling upon the Secretary of War for a report as to the officers of the fourth and fifth Indian regiments. In my absence it came in and was laid on the table. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

THE FIRE IN CHILI.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate (if not incompatible with the public interest) any official information which may have been received upon the subject of the recent destruction by fire of the church of the Compañia at Santiago de Chili, and the efforts of citizens of the United States to rescue the victims of the conflagration.

CONCENTRATED FEED.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be directed to inquire into the facts connected with the examination, by a board of officers appointed by the quartermaster's department, into the alleged advantages of "concentrated feed" for horses and mules in the cavalry service; whether any report favorable to its adoption was made, and if so, why the said feed has not been used in the service.

THE CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up the concurrent resolution for the appointment of a committee on the conduct of the war, which has been returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the resolution. The amendment is to strike out the words "that they have power to send for persons and papers and to sit during the sessions of either House of Congress, and to employ a stenographer;" and in lieu of these words to insert the following:

And may further inquire into all the facts and circumstances of contracts and agreements already made and that may be made, and such contracts and agreements hereafter to be made prior to the final report of the committee, by or with any department of the Government, in any wise connected with or growing out of the operations of the Government in suppressing the rebellion against its constituted authority; and that the said committee shall have authority to sit during the sessions of either House of Congress and during the recess of Congress, and at such times and places as said committee shall deem proper, and also to employ a stenographer as clerk at the usual rate of compensation.

And be it further resolved, That the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House or of the Senate, as the said committee may direct, shall attend in person or by assistant the sittings of the said committee, and serve all subpoenas put into his hands by the committee, pay the fees of all witnesses and the necessary and proper expenses of the committee.

And be it further resolved, That the Speaker of the House or the Vice President and President of the Senate shall be authorized to issue subpoenas to witnesses during the recess of Congress upon the request of the committee, in the same manner as during the sessions of Congress, and the said committee shall have authority to report in either branch of Congress at any time.

The amendment was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. WADE, and by unanimous consent, the Vice President was authorized to appoint the members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

REPORT OF MR. WRIGHT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

In accordance with a letter addressed by the Secretary of State, with my approval, to Hon. Joseph A. Wright, of Indiana, that patriotic and distinguished gentleman repaired to Europe and attended the International Agricultural Exhibition held at Hamburg last year, and has, since his return, made a report to me, which it is believed cannot fail to be of general interest, and especially so to the agricultural community. I transmit for your consideration copies of the letter and report. While it appears by the letter that no reimbursement of expenses or compensation should not be made him for them.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

January 29, 1864.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the message and accompanying report were ordered to be printed; and a motion of Mr. FESSENDEN to print fifteen hundred additional copies was referred to the Committee on Printing.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, the message and report were referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed a bill (S. No. 50) to authorize the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 35) to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department, or department of Missouri; and it was signed by the Vice President.

OATH OF OFFICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no other morning business, although the unfinished business of yesterday will not come as the special order until one o'clock, the Chair will now submit that to the Senate. The unfinished business of yesterday is the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] proposing an additional rule of the Senate. The question is on an amendment to that resolution, offered by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] Upon that question the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, the question which demands our attention at the present time is the legal effect, the constitutional force, and the regular operation of a certain statute law passed in 1862 requiring members of the Senate to take a certain oath, prescribed therein, before entering upon the duties of their office. The rule now proposed is to require all members falling within its operation, that is, those who have been elected since the passage of the act, to take that oath before proceeding further in their duties.

In order to understand properly the true intent and meaning, the purport and object of a statute, it is necessary and proper to take into consideration all the contemporaneous legislation in pari materia, all relating to that subject, passed in or about that time, bearing upon each other. I think that a large proportion of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] have been made in disregard of that rule. It is also an old rule of law that when we desire to ascertain the true meaning of a statute we are to take into consideration the old law, the mischief, and the remedy—the old law as it existed, the mischief that existed under it, and the remedy which the proposed new law contemplated.

In 1862, at the time of the passage of this act, there were a variety of laws relating to this subject of treason and its effect upon this Government. The attempts to remedy it were all begun in their incipient stages independent of each other. Some of them were passed at one period and some at another. Some of the statutes which were commenced first were ultimately passed after many others that were commenced afterwards; but in ascertaining their purpose and purport, I take it, we must look to them all as in pari materia.

Now what was our trouble which was intended in some measure to be corrected by these laws, this one among the others? I do not intend to occupy a great deal of time in undertaking a description of our condition at that time. Up to the year 1861, and for several months in that year, men occupied seats in this Senate and in the other House, but especially in this Chamber, who disclaimed all allegiance to our Government, who claimed the right to dismember that Government as a constitutional right, who set on foot plans to execute these purposes, and who openly declared such to be their purposes. They were a body of men distinguished for ability, domineering over the party of which they were in a great measure a majority, and which party was the dominant party of the Senate. They did this defiantly, menacingly, superciliously. This was the arena on which they put forth all their gladiatorial efforts of treason.

The time finally came when those men departed from this Chamber and from this city, as Catiline did from Rome, to go into the country and carry into effect by blood the conspiracy which they here concocted. They did go, and we soon learned, before the year 1863, that they did put in operation these their combinations, and that their hands were red with the blood of our people.

The question at once arose in this body, how can this country be secured against the repetition of this? Those men, and men like them, must be put out of this body, and they must be kept out of this body. No other course could secure the country. Whenever the opportunity occurred, whenever the majority was obtained by those whom they had left here, and by the places which were filled by the people, those men were expelled from the body.

The next question is, how are they to be kept out? It is clear, sir—it is not necessary that I should take up your time in proving that—if the interests of this Government are to be put into the keeping of men who avow their enmity to its existence, and who boldly plot its destruction, it is utterly impossible that that Government can long exist. If men of that character and men of that conduct can have seats and retain seats here, then there is an end of this Government. If the Constitution is so framed that it is subject to this infirmity incurably, it is an abortion, it is a total failure; and if any construction can be given to this Constitution which, in practical application, can produce this effect, it is as much a destruction of this Government as secession is.

Such was our condition and such were the demands upon us. It became necessary to inquire what was the mode of correction. It was quite evident that the taking of an oath to support the Constitution did not amount to any correction. All those men had that oath on them, and it furnished no sufficient security. The Constitution provided that a man should have certain qualifications in order to be admitted as a Senator: that he should be thirty years of age, a citizen of the United States for nine years, and a resident of the State electing him. If no other qualifications or disqualifications could by any possibility be framed and constitutionally executed, then those men were entitled to have their seats here if they could but get here, and, if entitled to take them, entitled to keep them. The question then returned directly on the mind, is it true that such is the Constitution of this Government that you can have no other qualifications or disqualifications that those mentioned in the Constitution? If you have no others, then clearly it was subject to the infirmity of which I have spoken.

The honorable Senator from Delaware seems to suppose all the way through his remarks that we have undertaken to create new disabilities by the form of the oath which we have prescribed, and all his argument has been confined to that, leveled to the form of that law. All his objections are made to that law, as if that law created, made, defined new qualifications or disqualifications. There is the great mistake. I will undertake to show that that statute does not contain any provision for a disqualification, never was made for any such purpose, that the disqualification which exists of which that statute speaks was created by entirely an independent and different law, passed at the same session, and therefore in pari materia on this subject of treason, and that the statute in regard to the oath is merely ancillary, auxiliary, aiding the body in the carrying into effect of the other independent law which created the disability. I now wish to call the attention of the Senate to the law to which I have alluded, not the law which is charged by the Senator with creating the disability, but the law which actually did create it.

Mr. President, I ask again what was the trouble which existed? It was nothing more nor less than this: that, as we viewed it, men who were traitors here and traitors in the field against us might have seats here, and we thought that those men should be, if they could be, disqualified from having seats here. We found upon looking at the existing statutes that the punishment for treason, the crime of treason, being itself defined in the Constitution, was death, no other. It is very true that if a man is executed it generally disqualifies him from holding office; but there seemed to be no other way to get him disqualified under the then existing law except by having him executed. It was hardly to be expected that we should ever be able, however successful we might be, to bring to trial and execution, I will not say hundreds, but thousands. There were a variety of considerations which entered in a great measure into the change of the law for the punishment of treason. It was changed, and I wish to call attention to it as it was changed. The law making the change was passed in July, 1862, and it provided—guilty thereof, shall suffer death, and all his slaves, if any, shall be declared and made free; or, at the discretion of the court, he shall be imprisoned for not less than five years, and fined not less than $10,000, and all his slaves, if any, shall be declared and made free; said fine shall be levied and collected on any or all of the property, real and personal, excluding slaves, of which the said person so convicted was the owner at the time of committing the said crime, any sale or conveyance to the contrary notwithstanding.”

“Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall hereafter incite, set on foot, or assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States, or the laws thereof, or shall give aid or comfort thereto, or shall engage in or give aid and comfort to any such existing rebellion or insurrection, and be convicted thereof, such person shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not exceeding ten years, or by a fine not exceeding $10,000, and by the liberation of all his slaves, if any he have; or by both of said punishments, at the discretion of the court.

“Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That every person guilty of either of the offenses described in this act shall be forever incapable and disqualified to hold any office under the United States.”

There was the law that created the disability; it was not the law about the oath. Another thing you will observe, Mr. President, that if disaffected States could send men here opposed to the existence of our Government, and who desired its destruction, and if those men could come from the battle-field of yesterday, sit here to-day and confound our councils and return to the battle-field to-morrow, what would be the consequence? These men, we well understand, could never be convicted in States thus sustaining them; and therefore if we were to wait for their conviction we could never be disabused of them in the Senate, could never be expurgated of them. This law was not drawn so as to provide that if a man shall be convicted of treason he shall be disqualified. That is not the expression. It was intended and made for the occasion. It is that “every person guilty of either of the offenses described in this act shall be forever incapable.” The man is incapable if he is guilty of the act. A disaffected State which would send a traitor here would not be likely to convict him; and if we could not be disabused and freed from persons of that kind to confound our councils, it is clear that this Constitution and this Government must go to ruin. Hence this law was drawn, intentionally drawn, in that way. What is the effect? Is there anything unconstitutional in it?

The honorable Senator from Delaware produces to us the decision in New York in the case of Jacob Barker against the People of the State, decided in their supreme court and carried to their court of errors and there affirmed, and he subscribes to the doctrine of that decision, and produces it as sustaining himself. The decision is that a State by its Legislature has a right to create an incapacity to hold office, a disqualification for office, as a punishment of crime, and the Senator admits that Congress by its legislation may do so as to officers under the United States. The Senator says so; that case says so; and if this country is without that power it is shorn of a power necessary to its existence. But there is nothing new in that. This is not a new case of that kind. Since the early day of 1790 we have had upon our statute-book a law that a man guilty of bribery in our courts should be disqualified from holding any office under the Government. In 1853 we passed a law that if a man was found guilty of bribery not merely in court, but in regard to any matter connected with the Government anywhere, he should be disqualified from holding office under the Government. Recently there have been a number of these statutes. There is nothing new in principle in them. I do not know why the United States Government, in the making of its laws for the punishment of crimes against its authority, is not clothed with the same power as a State Legislature. We have always so considered it, and have exercised the power. I know of no prohibition upon the power of Congress in the making of laws for the punishment of crime except the restriction that cruel or unusual punishment shall not be inflicted.

This statute, thus made, under this known and acknowledged authority of Congress, is entirely unobnoxious to a large part of the objections which the Senator from Delaware has made to the other law providing for the administering of the oath. He seems utterly to have overlooked this statute. He either believes or would lead others to believe that the disqualification of a man who is a traitor holding a seat here is to be found only in that oath law, and his great objection is to its being created in such a manner, either because he never heard, or never thought proper to look at, or did not desire to expose this law, which I have now presented.

This leads me, Mr. President, to make some remark now, in regular order, in relation to that other law, the law about which he finds so much fault. Suppose that no other law had been passed upon this subject of disqualification for treason except the one I have read, how would it have left it? The Senate and the House of Representatives, judges of the qualification of their own members, having before them this law providing that if a man was guilty of treason he should be disqualified from holding office, their only course would be to carry into effect that declared law as well as they could, making proper inquiry whether anybody who presented himself here for a seat fell within it, and if he fell within it to prohibit his taking the seat. In that case it would have been left entirely to their own rules, to their own order of proceeding. It would have been like a case which was mentioned the other day by the honorable Senator from Kentucky. He told us that the Legislature of the State of Kentucky recently passed a law by which they disfranchise all their citizens who have been engaged in this rebellion; do not permit them to vote; and he very properly added that the judges of election took their best course, according to their own judgment, to ascertain how the fact is.

Suppose a man were to present himself here as a Senator and you wished to ascertain in the easiest and the most convenient way you could whether he had the qualifications mentioned in the Constitution, would there be anything at all improper in the Senate's making a rule that each person presenting himself to be sworn in as a Senator should take an oath to answer whether he was thirty years of age; whether he was a citizen of the United States for nine years; whether he resided in the State that chose him a Senator? If they thought that the easiest, the most quiet and convenient practicable method of getting at the question of his qualifications or disqualifications, could not the Senate direct its President to ask him, “Are you thirty years old?” It might not do for him to own that he was not, because then he would not be entitled to the seat; but would there be anything improper in asking him the question? Is the form of the question varied if you ask him about a disqualification instead of asking him about a qualification? Not at all.

Suppose this law which I have read was the only law upon the subject, would it not have been competent and proper for the Senate at any time to say to a man elected after its passage, “Sir, we wish to inquire of you whether you have this disqualification?” Why not? Why not ask him about that as about any other qualification or disqualification, if it is a disqualification created by a constitutional law? I cannot see the difference. I think the Senate could adopt the very rule now proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts if this law had never been passed—a rule that they direct to be put to their members, the very form of oath prescribed in the law, to ascertain whether the party had been guilty of treason. I see no reason why it could not have been done whether there was a statute for it or not. I grant, however, that it is a more convenient way to have the rule made under the form of law in the first place, not merely to enable you to address yourselves to the man's conscience in the sight of God under the sanctions of religious belief, but also to do it under the sanctions of law; and it is made for all, not requiring any charges to be filed, not requiring any invidious distinctions to be made, but offering it to all who present themselves. Besides, when it has the sanction of law, a breach of the oath becomes perjury, whereas if it was merely prescribed by a rule a breach of it would not be perjury.

Now, sir, what is the true character of the law requiring this oath? It is nothing but a mode practically to aid the body in carrying into effect this previously existing declaration in relation to disqualification, not creating a disqualification. Suppose a law is made, such as is common in our States, that a man guilty of murder shall suffer death; and it may be that other crimes are also punished in the same manner. Another separate statute is made which directs how and in what manner the proper officer shall execute that statute, whether by hanging or shooting, or in what way, in what manner the thing shall be done by the officer that has the warrant to execute. Would it do to say that because that statute directed the sheriff to execute the man who had been convicted of murder by hanging therefore that law defined the crime or created the punishment for murder? Not at all; it only directed the manner of its execution. That would be the sheriff's warrant for the mode of execution; but the law which defined the crime and created the punishment was an entirely different statute. So it is in this case.

This naturally brings me to consider some of the objections which the honorable Senator makes to this last law, but it will be borne in mind that he all the while makes all his argument against that law, and treats it as if it were the only law on the subject. What he would say to this law which I have now produced, read, and presented to him, and how many of the objections he makes to the other law he would consider applicable to this, I do not know, I cannot say. It presents an entirely different case, and it removes a large part of the objections which the honorable Senator makes to the law prescribing the oath. I will now call attention to some few of the points of objection which he makes to that statute, and I think it will be apparent that whenever you look at those objections it will be found that in the view in which I have presented the subject, taking together all the laws made at that time on the subject-matter, many of them are entirely removed; but I will now attend to several of them seriatim.

One objection to this oath is that it is in the nature of a test oath, and that it may be extended so as to require a man to expurgate himself from all crimes. He says, in effect, that this is a precedent for any future Congress to make a law by which they may require a man to take an oath that he has never been guilty of larceny, or any other crime. Sir, it is not obnoxious to that objection. It only requires a man to take an oath in relation to a crime which by law creates a disqualification. Larceny would not disqualify a man from taking a seat in the Senate. Why not? Because we have no statute of the United States—and certainly State laws can have no effect upon it—which makes that a disqualification for holding office. This statute is nothing but a precedent for requiring an oath in relation to that which is a disqualification, no more. It is, therefore, not obnoxious to that objection, and cannot be a precedent for such a course as the Senator supposes.

But the Senator says Congress might under this precedent go on to pass a law on the subject of temperance, and might even require a man to swear that he had never partaken of wine or any other intoxicating fluid. He does not think they would be likely to do that, because it would break up Congress; but he says they might at any rate make him promise that he never would use such articles. I cannot see how, seriously and candidly, any one can make an assertion of that kind, and say that this law is a precedent for that. You will observe that that would be asking of a man to make an oath in relation to his future conduct. The honorable Senator from Delaware expressly says that there is nothing in this oath in relation to the promise of what he is to do in the present and the future to which he has any objection in the world, unless it may be to the phraseology in which it is couched. He thinks he could amend the phraseology; he thinks it is not in very good taste; but the substance of it he has no objection to in the world. Very well, then, this is not an oath which furnishes a precedent for saying that you may make a man promise and swear as to his future conduct in regard to any exceptionable matter, in relation to that which would be otherwise, if you please, entirely lawful.

This law does not require a man to take an oath that he will not do hereafter anything that is now lawful. It only requires him to swear that he will be faithful and bear true allegiance to the country. That, the Senator says, is right; to that he has no objection. In order to be a precedent for anything that is wrong of that kind, he should show that this law requires a man to take an oath that he will not do something which is entirely lawful and right. It is no such precedent. It is not obnoxious to such remark. The Senator thinks that under a precedent of this kind Congress might make an oath requiring a man to swear that he never was a member of the Know Nothings, never was a member of the order of Odd Fellows, never practiced medicine, or anything else, however lawful or however indifferent. Sir, I say there is nothing in it that can be a precedent for such a requisition. The portion of the oath which the Senator considers objectionable contains nothing but what relates to the disability created by the other law which I have read.

The next objection is that it is contrary to the fifth amendment to the Constitution. The winding up and the substance of that amendment is, that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, meaning, without trial and conviction. Now I ask, does this law deprive a man of life, liberty, or property? It tells the State, "You must not send traitors here; they are not entitled to hold seats in the Senate;" and it says to such men, "You had better not come here; you cannot occupy a place in the Senate."

But the gentleman says further, this is an ex post facto law. You require of the man to swear that he has not borne arms against the Government, &c.; what is to say, you require him to say not only that he has not borne arms against the Government since the passage of this act which I have read, but at no previous time. That would go back of the act on which and by which, I say, the disqualification exists. I desire to speak of this argument with all candor and fairness. If to-day there is a statute law which makes the punishment of larceny four years' imprisonment, and a man commits a larceny under it, and the next day afterwards, and before he is convicted, a law is passed that the punishment for larceny shall be two years' imprisonment, and he is tried, which of those sentences is to be passed upon him, the one that was in force when he committed the offense, the four years, or the two years? Clearly the two years and that only; and it is not for him to say, "That sentence of two years was ex post facto, after I had committed the larceny." As it is the most favorable, as it is the mildest, he should not complain of it.

Ex post facto laws are those which create that a crime which was not so before, or which operate on acts previously committed, or increase the punishment; but here you diminish the punishment. Now, sir, let us take a case under the Senator's argument. A man comes here under this law, this disqualification, and the question arises. He at once tells us, "You must not ask me about this as you proposed, nor under that law which you are carrying into effect, because that law was passed after some of the acts which you are asking me about had been committed." Now, what is that put into plain English? It is simply this: "the law formerly was that I should be disqualified by being hung for something that I did; now you are going to disqualify me under this law passed since the commission of the act without hanging me; and that is ex post facto, unconstitutional." That is all there is of that.

I come, now, Mr. President, to another part of the gentleman's argument which he made upon the law of which we are speaking, but not on the law in regard to the oath at all. He says we cannot change the qualifications mentioned in the Constitution; but he says he agrees entirely with the doctrine that you can disqualify a man by way of punishment of crime. He grants that you can by law disqualify a man for crime; and yet, though he grants that and produces the authority, he at the same time says we cannot add to the qualifications. Congress can do anything a State Legislature can do in relation to anything concerning their State government; and yet after all, the Senator insists upon it that we cannot change the qualification or disqualification of a member of the Senate; and that brings him to another point. He says that the man must be convicted; the Constitution requires that he shall be convicted, before he suffers anything. Sir, the law we are now trying to execute by the administration of this oath is not a matter of punishment. It is merely calling on us as judges of the qualifications of Senators to obtain evidence and pass practically upon that provision of the law. But the Senator says he must be convicted. That was one of the very troubles we had to encounter at the start. Disaffected States sent those Senators here, and the States that sent them, knowing their sentiments, knowing their conduct, and understanding their purposes, would not convict them, nor could they be convicted in them. The moment you admit that you must admit that your Constitution is so framed that if a man is guilty of treason and his State prefers to have him commit more, and do it in the Senate of the United States, it shall have the right to send him here, and you cannot prevent it.

But the gentleman goes further than this. He cites to us Humphrey Marshall's case in the Senate, which was a question of expulsion, to show that they there held that inasmuch as Mr. Marshall had not been convicted by a jury at home he could not be expelled for that offense. Now put these two arguments together: a man who is thus guilty of treason is sent here because he is guilty of treason to confound our counsels and destroy our Government; and the condition of your Constitution is such that you must admit him; and not only that, you cannot expel him because he has not been convicted by a jury, and he is in a State which sent him on the ground that they would not convict him; and, indeed, that was the very reason he was sent here; he was sent here for that very qualification. I do not wish to say anything more on that subject, but simply to put the case to the Senate. I have only this to say about it: whenever a man finds himself let out at the end of a course of ingenuous reasoning to a conclusion that is itself an absolute absurdity, one of two things must be true—that he has been guilty of some false logic in it, or else he is the dupe of his own sophistry.

What does such a doctrine make of your Government? Why, sir, the Government, according to the view of the Senator, with all the admiration he expresses for the Constitution, is a Government of inherent imbecility; it has within it germs of self-destruction; it is hedged around with provisions of the Constitution which, as he construes them, must make you receive a traitor on the floor because they will not convict him at home, and they sent him here because he was one, and you must keep him here; and this Chamber is by the very forms of your Constitution a great arena in which the traitors are to perform their gladiatorship. Indeed this is the very asylum, by the terms of the Constitution, the very sanctuary for traitors; and that is the condition of your Constitution! Why, sir, instead of being entitled to admiration and respect this makes of it the most intolerable abortion. I can hardly think of anything in language that would describe it unless it be the description which Richard III applied to himself and his own deformity:

"Deform'd, unfinish'd, sent before my time
Into this breathing world, scarce half made up,
And that so lamely and unfashionable,
That dogs bark at me, as I halt by them."

That is the condition of our Constitution, according to this mode of reasoning.

Mr. President, I find that I must soon conclude my remarks, because I have got through with the material I had on hand in the shape of notes, and the condition of my health is such that I shall endeavor to conclude as soon as possible. If what I have already said does not show the absolute necessity of the law which created this disability, and of this law for its execution, I can hardly conceive of anything I could say that could add to it. But perhaps a decent respect for the honorable Senator would demand of me to make a few additional remarks in reply to another point to which he adverted.

He says that this law does not include Senators at all; that Senators are not officers of this Government, and he cites Blount's case. I do not know what conclusion I and other men might come to when we were talking about some particular provision of the Constitution, whether it meant civil officers or not, when we compared it with other parts of that same instrument; we might get confounded in the comparison of the parts, and be troubled with some doubts with which we should never be troubled in reading another instrument. We have, as I said, a law from 1790, declaring that if a man was guilty of bribery in the courts of the United States, he should be disqualified from holding any office under the Government. Now I wish to know if a man was convicted of bribery whether it would really be insisted that he was disqualified and perfectly infamous in relation to all little offices of no consequence, but if he were elected to the Senate his infamy was to his credit, rather qualified him than otherwise, did not reach him there at all? How preposterous is such an argument! The different departments of this Government are represented by, embodied in, impersonated in the functionaries of those departments. The departments of this Government are the executive, judicial, and legislative; and now, forsooth, the Senator would fain have us believe, by a long course of very ingenious argument, that the legislative department of this Government is utterly destitute of any offices whatever, unless they consist in its clerks and pages. He contends that one whole division of the Government is without anybody to impersonate it, represent it, embody it, because its functionaries are not officers of the Government at all. It seems to me to be idle to talk about such a construction of the statutes declaring disqualifications from all offices as punishment for crime.

I take it, Mr. President, that when the law declares that the crime of bribery in the United States court disqualifies a man from holding any office under the Government of the United States it includes all of them, and especially the highest and most responsible, which are the most important to keep clear from pollution. Unless they can find in the statute itself something that creates doubt about its extent, as some gentlemen have found in the Constitution in regard to civil offices, certain it is that the general and sweeping terms in which it is couched include all offices, and "all offices" include all men who act in the offices of the different departments of this Government.

Mr. President, I have now gone over all the ground that I think necessary, and I have but a few words to say in conclusion. The honorable Senator had a number of weeks in which to prepare his argument, and after all, when you put the whole of it together it amounts to this: treason is no disqualification of office, especially for a Senator; it cannot be made such, because by so doing you will alter the qualifications in the Constitution; a person who has committed treason cannot be excluded unless he has been convicted by a jury in the State where guilty and to which he belongs, and there he cannot be convicted; and you must go on with your Constitution with that infirmity in it. The honorable Senator prepared and delivered here an eloquent eulogium upon that instrument, expressive of his admiration for it and his great desire to keep and preserve it; and yet if you believe his argument, the vain conclusion to which it all comes is, that that Constitution is incapable of self-preservation. The gentleman seems to speak of it as if his loyalty should properly be estimated by his great love for the Constitution, and he says he would be willing to suffer on that account. Sir, when a man, however much he may express his admiration for the Constitution, comes to conclusions in its construction that utterly and absolutely destroy it, I hardly think a martyrdom for the support of such principles will ever enroll his name on the same roll with Hampden and Sidney.

Mr. President, I am aware it is generally understood in our community that the period of our great men has passed away; that the defenders and the supporters of the Constitution, those who expounded and explained it and those who enforced and sustained it, like Webster and Clay and Jackson, has passed away. This is often said with great regret, rather to our disparagement, perhaps, in this body than otherwise. I have some little consolation, even if that be true, in this: I think the time has come when the community are not relying for their security upon a few great men; the whole masses of the community are more elevated. Whatever I may think of the great brilliancy and overshadowing power of such men as those I have mentioned, yet I cannot but believe, though I may have some slight vanity in it, that in the aggregate of this intelligence and information the Senate now will not suffer by any comparison even with those days; and though the defense of the Constitution and the continuance of its life may be committed to hands even weak as mine, after all my security is not founded in the ability of its defender, but in the discernment of this body, who are its expounders, and, I hope, its supporters.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss this question. I certainly would not presume to do so in its legal and constitutional aspects after the speech to which we have just listened. A law that has been passed by both Houses of Congress and signed by the President is constitutional enough for me until it has been repealed or decided to be unconstitutional by the appointed tribunal. I have very little respect for that amplitude of learning which flows all over a statute until it drowns out and obliterates its meaning; and none at all for that acuteness of criticism which refines away the significance of a law until the plain common sense, which finds no difficulty in grasping and comprehending it as it stands, becomes bewildered, and doubtful if it means anything at all.

But I rose, Mr. President, to call attention to an authority which, it seems to me, is perfectly conclusive upon the competency of Congress to pass this law. In the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland—a case so important and celebrated that it is familiar to those who have not made the law a professional study—Chief Justice Marshall holds the following language:

"The powers vested in Congress may certainly be carried into execution without prescribing an oath of office. The power to exact this security for the faithful performance of duty is not given, nor is it indispensably necessary. The different departments may be established; taxes may be imposed and collected; armies and navies may be raised and maintained; and money may be borrowed, without requiring an oath of office. It might be argued, with as much plausibility as other incidental powers have been assumed, that the Convention was not unmindful of this subject. The oath which might be exacted—that of fidelity to the Constitution—is prescribed, and no other can be required. Yet he would be charged with insanity who should contend that the Legislature might not superadd to the oath directed by the Constitution such other oath of office as its wisdom might suggest."

It seems to me that this authority is perfectly conclusive upon the subject; that it is almost prophetic in its application to the question before us. I do not desire to add anything to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do you read from 4 Wheaton's Reports?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir; 4 Wheaton, page 416.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, by the Constitution of the United States it is required that Senators and Representatives shall be bound by oath or affirmation to its support, and no other oath or affirmation was taken by any Senator or Representative until the present Congress; nor was it sought to impose any other oath until by the act of 2d July, 1862, it was required that the party assuming any office of the United States shall first by solemn oath declare, not only his fidelity to the Constitution in the future, but that in the past he has not voluntarily borne arms against the United States, nor given aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; and neither sought nor accepted nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States, nor yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto. When I took my seat in this Chamber as a Senator from the State of Indiana, although I did not believe it could rightfully be required, yet, lest my course might be misunderstood by some and misconstrued by others, and as there was nothing in the oath to which I could not without any reservation bind myself, I did not contest the question, but voluntarily, upon what I esteemed a proper explanation, complied with the requirements of the act. But, sir, when it is now sought by a rule of the Senate, proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] to require this oath of all Senators who may hereafter demand seats in this body, I will not give the proposition my vote or support. Whoever comes here, being duly elected, and having the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution, has a right to his seat, and his State may well demand it for him. The right of his State to be represented by him is conferred by the Constitution, and cannot be denied or impaired by any rule of this body or by any act of Congress. I will not stop to inquire whether the language of the act, considered in the light of established rules of construction and of adjudged cases, includes Senators and Representatives; but will maintain that if construed to include them it is so far in conflict with the Constitution and null and void. Nor will I stop to question that terms may be added to the oath of obedience to the Constitution required of all officers, but such additional terms cannot add to or take from the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution. The Constitution provides that "no person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen." A person not thirty years of age, or who has not been nine years a citizen, or who is not an inhabitant of the State for which he is chosen, is not qualified to be a Senator, but all other persons are qualified, and there is no power in the Government to disqualify or render them ineligible. By declaring these three circumstances of disqualification, touching the age, citizenship, and residence of the party, the Constitution excludes every other disqualification. The rule of construction is well stated by Story in his work on the Constitution. He says:

"It would seem but fair reasoning, upon the plainest principles of interpretation, that when the Constitution established certain qualifications as necessary for office it meant to exclude all others as prerequisites. From the very nature of such a provision, the affirmation of these qualifications would seem to imply a negative of all others." "A power to add new qualifications is certainly equivalent to a power to vary them."

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] cited the oath required of United States judges by the judiciary act of 1789, and claimed it as a conclusive precedent and authority upon the question. With great deference to that gentleman, both because of his conceded ability as a jurist and because of his position in this body at the head of the Judiciary Committee, I cannot admit that he has found either a precedent or an authority for the measure he now advocates. It is true that the Constitution requires the judges to take an oath of obedience to it; and it is also true that the act of 1789 adds terms to that oath; but has it escaped the attention of the Senator that the oath of office required of the judges is in no respect retrospective, but is altogether prospective, and looks only to a faithful discharge of the duties of their high office? By the terms of that oath no qualifications are superadded to the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution, and no persons are by it excluded from the bench who are eligible under the Constitution. When a judge of the United States courts swears that he will obey the Constitution, and "will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and the rich, and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent upon him," he gives a solemn assurance of official fidelity in the future, but he looks not over his past life; nor is he required to disavow either follies, faults, or crimes. He is not denied the office because he cannot swear that he is without fault in respect to the law, the Constitution, or, it may be, his allegiance.

But, sir, the measure now before the Senate is almost if not altogether otherwise. It is not prospective, nor does it seek to secure fidelity in office; but for the most part is retrospective, and seeks to exclude from seats in this Chamber persons who are not excluded by the Constitution, and to establish disqualifications unknown to that instrument.

It cannot be said that the proposed rule requires an oath but does not prescribe a qualification, for if the oath be required an entire class is excluded; as effectually excluded as if the cause were interpolated among the disqualifications prescribed in the Constitution. Could this body by a rule, or Congress by a law, require Senators before taking their seats to take an oath that they are over forty years of age, or that they have been twenty-one years citizens of the United States? All will agree that it could not be done. And why not, sir? For the obvious reason that it would be going beyond the constitutional disqualifications, and attempting to exclude classes not excluded by that instrument.

The measure before the Senate is proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] Will that Senator allow me to remind him that when he took his seat in this body, twelve years ago, Senators of his political views were in a small minority; that both branches of Congress were controlled by men who, standing upon the adjudications of every department of the Government, believed that the Constitution not only allowed but required legislation on the part of Congress securing the return of fugitive slaves; and that good faith, as well as the harmony of the sections and the unity of the Republic, required that the laws enacted for that purpose should be faithfully executed. As I understand, that Senator came with avowed convictions adverse to the constitutional power of Congress to enact laws upon that subject, and disclaiming all obligation on the part of the citizen to aid in their enforcement. Now, sir, had Congress by law, or the Senate by a rule, required that Senator, before taking his seat, by solemn oath or affirmation to declare that in the past he had given no countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in resisting the execution of the fugitive slave laws, and that in the future he would be loyal to their requirements and obligations, what course would the honorable Senator then have felt it his duty to pursue? If animated by the lofty sentiments of the great men his State has produced, he would have returned to her and at her feet laid down the commission she had put in his hands and the robes of office she had placed upon his shoulders, and made report to her that he had been denied his seat in a "Senate of equals;" that terms had been required of him unknown to the Constitution; and that it was for the ancient Commonwealth to maintain her Federal rights and equality, and to vindicate her wounded honor. To resist the laws of the United States in South Carolina is a grievous crime; but, sir, is it any less a crime in Massachusetts? The act in either State disturbs the foundations of public authority; and, upon principle, as well may test oaths and solemn disclaimers of crime be required of Senators from the one State as from the other. As a question of constitutional right, he who comes here, being duly chosen by a sovereign State, and having the constitutional qualifications, is entitled to demand his seat, and to deny it is to break the Federal compact.

The proposition before the Senate, Mr. President, involves other and quite as important considerations. It reaches to questions involved in the reorganization and reconstruction of the Federal Union. This war cannot continue forever. The time will come when it shall have ceased to agitate the world, leaving, it may be, scenes of desolation to mar the face of our country; society distracted; and, scattered upon every side, the broken "columns and arches" of our institutions. Then will arise the questions that appertain to a state and condition of peace. To restore and re-establish will then be the duty of the statesman. Is it not well now, sir, to anticipate that condition of our affairs, and to avoid that which may render the duty and labor of reconstruction more difficult?

For myself individually, for the State which, in connection with my distinguished colleague, I represent, and for the great political party of that State of which I am a member, I declare the restoration of the American Union upon the basis of the Constitution to be the highest political good we seek; and, sir, I will aid to dig no deep ditches and to build no high walls to separate the people of the North and of the South; but will the rather labor to remove every obstruction and impediment; to tear down the walls by this Administration already built, and throw bridges across the ditches already dug, that the people may come together again and dwell in harmony as in the days of our fathers. This is demanded by every consideration resting upon the glories of the past, the interests of the present, and the hopes of the future. When the war shall have done its work by breaking the armies and destroying the military power of the rebellion, upon what principle and plan are the States and people to be brought together? The proposition before the Senate rests upon the measure of the entire subjugation of the people of the South, and the policy of holding them in such subjection by the military power of the Government, treating each person who may have been connected with the rebellion as a public enemy and disfranchised criminal. Vast, sir, as our resources are, they are not sufficient to maintain permanently a military force such as this policy would require; firmly fixed as are the principles of civil liberty in the American mind, they cannot withstand the influences of a standing army of such gigantic proportions; and strong as our position may be among the nations of the civilized world for the great qualities we have displayed, yet we may not wish impunity defy the judgment of mankind by the treatment of a conquered foe that would find a parallel only in the case of broken, bleeding, glorious Poland. The civilization of this age, the perpetuity of our form of government, and the great interests of the people which would cluster around a restored Union, demand that the returning States come with all their "dignity, equality, and rights unimpaired;" and that to the people, with such exceptions as the public safety may require, a free pardon be extended, upon the condition only of fidelity to the Constitution, the Union, and the flag.

Aside from considerations of policy, is not the sentiment of magnanimity, kindness, and generosity toward a fallen foe an ornament to manhood, appreciated and honored wherever found, whether in individuals or nations? Sir, if our country can be saved and ancient attachments revived, who is so base as to interpose his animosities to delay or hinder so great a blessing to the world?

The appeal to passion is easily made that Davis, Toombs, and Slidell, and their associates, the leaders in the rebellion, must not be allowed to resume seats in the Senate, and we often witness a vast deal of patriotic indignation at the mention of such a possibility. Now, sir, I cannot express sentiments of such decided gratification at such association as have been attributed to the distinguished Secretary of State. I have not entertained the thought nor contemplated the possibility, for the plain reason that they can never come here as Senators. The failure of the rebellion is their failure, and its fall their fall; and they will be occupied rather in looking after their personal safety than in seeking official positions. For the authors of the rebellion I have no defense to make and no apologies to urge. Within the Constitution they might demand, and the northern Democracy cheerfully conceded and fought to maintain, the rights our fathers agreed they should enjoy, but outside the Constitution they are entitled to neither our support nor sympathy. But, sir, in the southern States there are millions of persons who did not contribute to bringing on the revolution, but over whom the government de facto of the confederate States was established, and which has asserted and maintained its authority for nearly three years. Officers were chosen and laws enacted whose authority individuals could not successfully resist. Taxes were paid, writs obeyed, commercial regulations respected, confederate currency paid and received, and military levies enforced, and all under the authority of a government de facto, and in the absence of the protecting power of the Government of the United States. Is it right, is it just to treat a people so circumstanced as criminals, to whom no pardon shall be extended after they shall have returned to their allegiance except upon terms humiliating and debasing? During the debate upon the confiscation bill in 1862 the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] expressed views upon this subject so forcible in themselves, and coming from so distinguished a source, that I may with propriety refer to them. He said:

"I will remark another thing. These men have established a de facto government over that people. If a man finds himself in a de facto government which he cannot resist, and has no power to control, what are the limits and measures of his obligations? It requires a brave man to say that he will war upon it because he thinks it is a usurpation. It would be a bold man who would say now, 'The United States made a rebellion against England, and all the present power you have, national and State, is itself but a usurpation; I do not owe it any obedience, and I will not obey it.' How idle it would be for an individual, a weak man, to talk in that way. Just so it is with the people in these States. However loyal their feelings, a government de facto is over them; they cannot get away; they have nowhere to go; they have nothing to go with. What would you have a man there to do? What has this nation a right to demand of him?"

"But it is said 'men have actually taken office there under that government; they have had the audacity to do that since that government has been established over them.' I do not profess to be very highly versed in the ethics of politics, but I am fond of looking to examples that are bright and high. At the time of the rebellion under Cromwell, which had established a government de facto over the people of England, and had put down the existing Government, application was made to Chief Justice Hale—a man whose character stands as high, perhaps, as any in the annals of Christian judges—to take the place of Chief Justice, he being opposed to that government. Justice Hale consulted with a couple of his friends, (bishops,) and after full deliberation came to this conclusion: 'Justice must be administered; the rights between man and man must be adjudged upon; somebody must hold courts; I can consider it no sin to take an office under a de facto government, though it is a usurpation.' He took it, and the man was not adjudged guilty of treason upon the restoration of Charles II. He continued in position ever afterwards. In all the troubles between the house of York and the house of Lancaster, in the wars of the Roses, when revolutions were constant and frequent, one day a man of this family upon the throne and the next day one of the other, as early as the period of Henry VII a statute was passed which has abided in England through all the revolutions afterwards, that no man should be adjudged guilty of treason because he was obedient to the reigning king, no matter if he was a usurpation. Such, sir, is the respect paid by the world, and especially that part of the world from which we sprung, to a de facto government, and the nations of the earth deal with them as governments, no matter what the usurpation."

There accompanied the President's recent message a proclamation of conditional pardon to a portion of the people of the South, presenting the executive plan of reconstruction, to which it is proper in this connection to refer. By issuing the proclamation the President assumes that the time has now come in the prosecution of the war when it is proper for us to offer terms of conciliation and adjustment; and as the proclamation is addressed to the people in rebellion, the question forces itself upon every candid mind, is it likely to reach and influence them so as to restore peace and union; or, on the other hand, is it likely to prove a stumbling-block and a hindrance?

That some persons may properly be excluded from executive clemency I will not now question; but in the proclamation the excepted and excluded classes are so numerous and so potential as probably to defeat it as a peace measure. Of those to whom the pardon is offered an oath is required as a condition so objectionable in its terms, and to which such extraordinary consequences are attached, as to array against the measure hostility both in the South and in the North. Each person is required to swear fidelity to the Constitution and the Union. That is eminently right and proper. But then he must also swear that he will "abide by and faithfully support all acts of Congress" and "all proclamations of the President passed and made during the existing rebellion having reference to slavery." This language would seem to include laws and proclamations hereafter to be passed and made as well as those already known to the country. And is it not most extraordinary, and a cruel thing, that as a condition of a general pardon, which the peace and happiness of the country demand, men shall become bound by oath to "abide by and faithfully support" that which they cannot know? The great body of the people of the South, and a very powerful element in northern society, constituting, as I believe, a decided majority of the people of the United States, do not believe that much of the legislation of the last Congress, and the proclamations of the President on the subject of slavery in the States, are sanctioned by the Constitution; but, on the contrary, they believe them in palpable violation thereof. How, then, sir, is it proper to require of such men, in the same oath, to swear that they will "henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States," and in like manner that they will "abide by and faithfully support" acts and proclamations which they honestly believe violative and subversive of that instrument?

In his letter to the Springfield convention of last fall, the President quaintly said, "But the proclamation, as law, either is valid or is not valid. If it is not valid it needs no retraction; if it is valid it cannot be retracted any more than the dead can be brought to life." If not valid men ought not to be sworn to its support; and it is a horrible condition of a pardon that a man shall be sworn to the support of an invalid and unconstitutional proclamation. But if valid the President claims for it the force and effect of law—that it did its work, propria vigore, by the instant freedom of the slaves; and if so why invoke to its aid the oaths of the people so to regard it? It indicates a doubt, if not a conviction, on the part of the President adverse to its validity when he appeals to the slaveholders by the hope and assurance of pardon upon the condition of becoming bound by oath to treat their slaves as free.

By this last proclamation the President undertakes to assure the country that whenever so many as one tenth of the voting population in either of the States of Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina, shall have taken the oath which he prescribes, such one tenth, excluding all others, "shall re-establish such State government, which shall be republican and in nowise contravening said oath, and such shall be recognized as the true government of the State;" and he suggests as not improper—

"That in constructing a loyal State government in any State, the name of the State, the boundary, the subdivisions, the constitution, and the general code of laws, as before the rebellion, be maintained, subject only to the modifications made necessary by the conditions hereinbefore stated, and such others, if any, not contravening said conditions, and which may be deemed expedient by those framing the new State government."

Will the Senate and the country pause to contemplate the extraordinary powers here arrogated by the President? Ten States are mentioned; three of them were of the original and illustrious thirteen. Are these ten political communities a part of the Union this day, or, in the eye of the Constitution, are they outside the Union? If they are outside and no longer States of the Union, by what power that we recognize and by what action that we respect did this thing occur? It was by no action of the United States. The Federal Government has all the while claimed jurisdiction over them, and by legislative and executive action has exercised that jurisdiction when and where not hindered by armed resistance. If not by the action of this Government, then are these States out of the Union by their own action, each State by her separate act of secession taking herself out? It would be rank political heresy to assert it. They are yet States of the Union, but States in which the people are in armed resistance to the United States; and they can cease to be States of the Union only by the success of the revolution. We have but to restore the lawful authority of the Federal Government over the people thereof, and secure their acquiescence and obedience, and the Union is restored.

In these ten States the President proposes a plan for organizing "new State governments," with the assurance that they "shall be recognized as the true governments of the States." By what authority is this assurance given? What provision of the Constitution constitutes him the architect to tear down and rebuild State governments? Our fathers held, and the patriot statesmen from their day until now have held, that the people only could lay the foundations of State governments, and build thereon the institutions of their choice. This work, however, the President commits to the hands of such as shall take the oath that he requires, being not less than one tenth of the voting population. Has it been heard of before in modern times that one tenth of the people shall frame the government and enact the laws that the other nine tenths are to respect and obey? It has been a cherished American sentiment, and esteemed vital to liberty, that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," but now we are told that they may derive their powers from the consent of one man out of ten; provided, however, that he may consent only to that which the President consents to, and do what he requires, and must first be bound by oath to support the executive policy. We were told at one time that popular institutions were being established in France; that all were allowed to vote for the chief executive officer, provided, however, they must vote for Louis Napoleon; and we laughed in derision, and said that a slavish despotism was being established. What think you then, sir, of this scheme of allowing political power in ten States of the Union to none but such as the President shall designate, and they first to be sworn to carry out his wishes? And the President says the new State governments must be republican! Our fathers thought, and we were taught, that a republican government was one in which the people, through representatives chosen by themselves, make their own laws; and that where the few govern the many it was an oligarchy. But now we must unlearn all that and allow that republicanism may survive when the few form the government and make the laws which the many must obey. When so many as one tenth of the people in any State shall have taken the oath and have formed the new State government, the question will arise what representation shall they have in Congress? When recognized as a State, the Constitution fixes the representation at two Senators and a representation based, not upon the tenth of sworn men—voting men—but upon the "whole number of free persons," which will then include all the negroes, as the new State would then regard them as free; so that the President's new-made voter, in his new State, would have a political power equal to ten men in Indiana. Who are likely first to take the prescribed oath, and thus become the President's voting clansmen, clothed with political power above all the men of the country? It is proper to presume there will be many true Union men, who opposed secession; then will come that class who always array themselves on the strong side, and who were noisy and active supporters of the southern cause in the days of its triumphs, but abandon its waning fortunes. But prominent and powerful will be the camp-followers—northern men with, but not of, the Army—who seek fortunes in speculation and plunder. Can we, sir, consent that political power shall be conferred upon such men ten times greater than the free and true men whom we represent enjoy? I would not feel that I had done my duty toward the voters of Indiana did I not enter my protest against a scheme so unjust to them.

The Constitution, article one, section two, leaves to the States to define the qualifications of voters; but the President undertakes to exclude all who decline to bind themselves by oath to his policy. It may not be said that none are thus disfranchised but rebels; for I cannot doubt that thousands who have been true to the Union all the while, and who now labor for its restoration upon the basis of the Constitution, will decline an oath unknown to the Constitution, humbling to their manhood, and which strips them of their freedom of opinion and action touching matters appertaining to State government. And however good and true men they may have been, and still are, yet they are excluded. Without the oath they are disfranchised, while the motley assemblage of public virtue, the President's own sworn men, are allowed the rights of citizenship and the exclusive power of government. If under the State laws persons tried and convicted of treason are disfranchised and rendered incapable of holding offices of trust and profit, it is well; but if the State laws do not so provide the President cannot disqualify. The President cannot disfranchise him whom the State has enfranchised. The Constitution forbids it; the rights of the States forbid it; and our rights as citizens forbid it.

The President suggests to his sworn men that in demolishing and reconstructing State institutions they shall not change the name of the State, its boundary, its subdivisions, its constitution or general code of laws, only so far as may be required by the terms and conditions of the proclamation, or as may be deemed by them expedient. Every step taken by the President in this direction is upon the fragments of a broken Constitution. The Carolinas and Georgia had their names and their boundaries before the Union was formed, fixed and established by colonial charters, and with their ancient names and boundaries they agreed to the Union; and of the remaining seven of the States mentioned by the President it is enough to say that their names and boundaries were established by the people when the States were formed, and agreed to by Congress by the acts admitting them into the Union. These ancient attributes of the States, conferred in the most solemn modes known to us as a people, cannot thus be disturbed by the President, or by the few who may act under his assumed authority. But, sir, the Constitution forbids argument on this question by the provision protecting the integrity of State boundaries unless by the consent of the States affected and of Congress, article four, section three.

The President also requires, in effect, that the State constitutions shall be changed so as to conform to his proclamation. In most and perhaps all of the constitutions of these States, provision is made for their own amendment; and it is clear where there are no such provisions they can be changed only by the people acting in their sovereign capacity, through their delegates selected for that purpose. But without reference to the provisions of the constitutions for their own amendment, and without regard to the original and exclusive right of the people to make and change their State constitutions, the President proposes to conform them to his own policy, through his agents sworn to that end in advance. Mr. President, can any pretext of State necessity, can any pretended exigencies of the war, or any conceivable hope of future good, justify so clear a violation of the Constitution, and disregard of the principles upon which our institutions are based? To preserve the Federal Government is the duty of every citizen; but co-existent is the duty of preserving the States with all their rights and the privileges of the people unimpaired. Measures that destroy the States, or impair the rights of the people under them, strike a blow at the Union, and endanger the Federal Government. Can the supporting columns be stricken down and the temple yet stand? The States and Federal Union form one harmonious whole—they must stand together or fall in a common ruin.

The people of the United States have been wisely jealous of power in its efforts to perpetuate itself. The history of the past two years, and the present condition of the country, admonish us that they cannot now be too vigilant in guarding their liberties. An important presidential election is approaching, in which the people will struggle to maintain their rights and privileges, and the Administration to hold its power. The President commands the most numerous and powerful Army known to history; he controls the disbursement of larger sums of money than were ever controlled by any one power, and reaches every neighborhood by his all-pervading patronage. Prostrate Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware admonish us that the brave and timid alike are paralyzed at the polls by the sword; and in all the States we behold the power of patronage and money over the venal and corrupt. There are appalling odds in the contest between power and the people, and the only hope is in the virtue of the people and their devotion to their ancient liberties. But, sir, the President's proclamation seeks in addition to place ten States under his absolute control—to exclude all who will not first swear fealty to his measures, thus securing presidential electors who will lay their votes at his feet. Can the liberties of the people survive the success of a scheme so dangerous?

Without questioning that the President may grant a conditional pardon, I do deny that he may impose a condition that will control the action of the pardoned man touching the policy of his State, for that policy being exclusively of the State, shall be decided by the people thereof, uninfluenced and uncontrolled by Federal power, for the reason that it is by the Constitution expressly reserved to the State and to the people; and an attempt by Federal authority to control it is a usurpation. And I deny that a condition may be imposed upon the pardoned man which interferes with his freedom as an elector, for the reason that, so far as our institutions rest upon popular suffrage, their spirit requires that the voter shall vote for the man of his choice, for such reasons and upon such considerations as satisfy his own judgment and conscience; and any interference with the absolute and entire freedom of suffrage is a blow at our popular institutions. Was there ever a time in our history when a President, elected by the Whig or Democratic party, in granting a pardon would have dared to require the man to swear that he would support the policy and vote for the men of the party in power? A single instance of the sort would have driven the President and his party from power before a storm of popular indignation in the days of public and political virtue.

Mr. President, at the beginning of the war such assurances were given, both to the country and foreign nations, by the executive and legislative departments of the Government, touching the purpose and policy of the war, and the principles that would be respected when it should cease, that they cannot now be disregarded without a breach of public faith. In his inaugural message, delivered when hostilities were impending, the President said:

"I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so."

"I understand a proposed amendment to the Constitution—which amendment, however, I have not seen—has passed Congress, to the effect that the Federal Government shall never interfere with the domestic institutions of the States, including that of persons held to servitude. To avoid misconception of what I have said, I depart from my purpose not to speak of particular amendments, so far as to say that, holding such a provision now to be implied constitutional law, I have no objection to its being made express and irrevocable."

These declarations of his purpose, and definitions of constitutional restrictions upon executive power, were made by the President under most solemn circumstances, forming almost a part of the official oath; and addressing his "dissatisfied fellow-countrymen," he said:

"You have no oath registered in heaven to destroy the Government, while I shall have the most solemn one to 'preserve, protect, and defend it.'"

Is it not enough now to ask, what change has since been made in the Constitution which gives him "lawful right" to "interfere with the institution of slavery in the States," or to do any other act which it was not lawfully right for him to do when sworn into office?

After the war had commenced, in his message to Congress on the 4th July, 1861, the President repeated the assurances given in his inaugural. He said:

"Lest there be some uneasiness in the minds of candid men as to what is to be the course of the Government toward the southern States after the rebellion shall have been suppressed, the Executive deems it proper to say, it will be his purpose then, as ever, to be guided by the Constitution and the laws; and that he probably will have no different understanding of the powers and duties of the Federal Government, relatively to the rights of the States and the people under the Constitution, than that expressed in the inaugural address."

And to remove all possibility of doubt, and all hesitation in the support of the war, he repeats the assurance in his message of December 3, 1861, as follows:

"The inaugural address at the beginning of the Administration, and the message to Congress at the late special session, were both mainly devoted to domestic controversy, out of which the insurrection and consequent war have sprung. Nothing new occurs to add or subtract to or from the principles or general purposes stated and expressed in those documents."

These repeated assurances were given to the people at home that they might be united in the support of the war, upon the conviction that it was and would be prosecuted for the sole purpose of restoring the Union, and not at all for any purpose of the abolition of slavery; but it became important also to give the assurance to foreign Governments, so that they might not interfere by recognition or otherwise, and to that end Mr. Seward, in his letter of April 22, 1861, to our minister to France, said:

"The Territories will remain in all respects the same whether the revolution shall succeed or shall fail. The condition of slavery in the several States will remain just the same whether it succeed or fail. There is not even a pretext for the complaint that the disaffected States are to be conquered by the United States if the revolution fail, for the rights of the States, and the condition of every human being in them, will remain subject to exactly the same laws and forms of administration whether the revolution shall succeed or whether it shall fail. In the one case the States would be federally connected with the new confederacy; in the other they would as now be members of the United States; but their constitution and laws, customs, habits, and institutions in either case will remain the same."

"It is hardly necessary to add to this incontestable statement the further fact that the new President, as well as the citizens through whose suffrages he has come into the administration, has always repudiated all designs whatever, and wherever imputed to him and them, of disturbing the system of slavery as it is existing under the Constitution and laws. The case, however, would not be fully presented if I were to omit to say that any such effort on his part would be unconstitutional, and all his actions in that direction would be prevented by the judicial authority, even though they were assented to by Congress and the people."

Under date of May 6, 1861, to our minister to Russia, Mr. Seward said:

"All existing interests of slavery are protected now, as heretofore, by our Federal and State constitutions, sufficient to prevent the destruction or molestation of the institution of slavery where it exists by Federal or foreign intervention, without the consent of the parties concerned."

These extracts are taken from letters of general instruction to our foreign ministers, furnishing the grounds they should assume, and the arguments they should urge in maintaining, before the Governments to which they were accredited, that we are in the right; that we prosecute the war to re-establish the rightful authority of the Government, and not to destroy or disturb established institutions.

But that there should remain no doubt in the country, or in the world, upon the great question, at the special session of July, 1861, Congress, with great unanimity, declared:

"That this war is not waged, on either part, in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of these States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired, and as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

I will quote from a writer upon this resolution:

"Here was a distinct and formal declaration by the national Legislature, at an early stage of the war, of its objects:

"1. It was not waged for oppression, conquest, or subjugation, or to overthrow or interfere with the rights or institutions of the States."

"2. It was waged to maintain the Constitution—to preserve the Union—with the 'dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired.'"

"3. 'As soon as these objects (the maintenance of the Constitution, preservation of the Union, and protection of the rights of the States) are accomplished the war ought to cease.'"

What was the immediate effect of these solemn and unequivocal assurances given by two of the departments of the Government? The confederate States, although recognized as a belligerent, failed to secure their recognition as a Government de jure, and their position abroad became every day more embarrassing, and although they urged the derangement of trade and commerce, the short supply of cotton, and their own gigantic efforts to maintain their independence, yet they could not win a recognition, for the Governments of Europe had been assured that the war was prosecuted on the part of the United States to reestablish legitimate authority. But at home, sir, the effect was yet more astounding. The call for volunteers was responded to with fierce zeal in every State and county throughout the North, men rallied to the standard without distinction of political parties, a mighty army sprang into existence, as if called up by the wand of a magician, that shook the solid earth beneath its heavy tread. The patriotic fervor knew no abatement until the country was shocked by the proclamation of September, 1862. If Senators ask what has discouraged enlistments, why it is so difficult to fill up the Army, and why, in the language of another, men have to be dragged by the draft like bullocks to the slaughter pen, let the inquiry be made at the other end of the avenue, and of those who advised that ill-starred measure. Even in Massachusetts we have not an equivalent for the losses in the more conservative sections, although her Governor did, as I believe, assure the President and the country that, if a radical policy were adopted, the highways and byways would be thronged by crowding, jostling multitudes, eager for the places of rendezvous.

Mr. President, I ask Senators if they do believe that the President's proclamation and the proposed rule of the Senate will promote and hasten the return of an honorable and permanent peace? Very recently one of the most powerful journals of the country in the support of the Administration said:

"We must not shut our eyes to the fact that if we are to restore the Union at all we must do it with the assent and cooperation of the great body of the people in the rebel States."

What believer in popular institutions can hesitate to adopt the sentiment? And yet, sir, by the rule of the Senate resting upon the act of 1862, it is proposed to close the doors of the Senate and House and all the avenues to positions of honor and profit against all the people of the South who cannot come without fault touching the rebellion, and by the proclamation of the President to exclude from pardon and citizenship all who will not abjure their rights and privileges and the rights and prerogatives of their States. Sir, we need not deceive ourselves; these are not peace measures, they are not inspired by a hope to restore our once glorious Union; they are hinderances and impediments, deep ditches and high walls, to be in the way of the people coming together again. We know that if the desire be for permanent peace and reunion we must throw the proclamations to the winds, and again, high above all, raise the banner and the Constitution of our country. Then, if suffering and desolation have opened the eyes of the great body of the people of the South to the error of the past and hopelessness of the future, we may hope that they will come back if we but open our arms to receive them.

In the Northwest we want peace; we want peace in a restored Union and upon terms honorable to the North and just toward the South; upon terms that will leave us friends and not enemies; and we want peace before the North is exhausted and the South destroyed, so that the shores of the Gulf and the borders of the southern rivers may again wave with the sugar-cane and whiten with the bursting cotton; that in all that region we may find a remunerative market for the heavy products of our rich lands, and so that from the sources of the Ohio, the Wabash, and the Mississippi, throughout their entire flow to the Gulf, there may be a united, harmonious, and happy people, bringing reciprocal blessings by the exchange of all acts of kindness and a restored and growing commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was informed yesterday that the Senator from Delaware who has not been heard [Mr. SAULSBURY] desired to address the Senate on this subject. I told him that, with the consent of the Senate, I would waive addressing the body until he should have been heard.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I prefer that the Senator from Maryland should address the Senate first; and to give him an opportunity of being heard fully on the subject, if agreeable to the Senate I move that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER. Perhaps some other Senator may be disposed to go on this afternoon. ["Oh, no."]

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK.) It is moved that the further consideration of this resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER. As there is executive business to be done, I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 20, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORT OF SUPERINTENDENT PUBLIC PRINTING.

THE SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the eleventh annual report of the Superintendent of Public Printing; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE SPEAKER announced as the select committee ordered yesterday on the chemist of the Department of Agriculture, Mr. GODLOVE S. ORTH of Indiana, Mr. BRUTUS J. CLAY of Kentucky, Mr. ANTHONY L. KNAPP of Illinois, Mr. JOHN L. DAWSON of Pennsylvania, and Mr. FREDERICK E. WOODBRIDGE of Vermont.

GRANT OF LAND TO IOWA.

Mr. ALLISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill making a grant of land to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of the McGregor, Western and Cedar Falls, and Minnesota railroads in said State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LINE OFFICERS OF THE NAVY.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grades of the line officers of the United States Navy," approved July 16, 1862; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

The regular order of business being demanded, THE SPEAKER announced that the regular order of business was the call of committees for reports, under which the House would resume the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) to amend a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, upon which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SWEAT] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. If the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary is present, I would ask him to move to postpone the consideration of this resolution two or three days in order that other committees may make their reports—say until next Monday morning after the morning hour.

Mr. WILSON. With an understanding in relation to the time when a vote may be taken upon this resolution, I have no objection to the postponement; but if it is to be postponed without any understanding, so that when a week shall have passed we shall be no nearer the end of the discussion than now, I think perhaps we had better have the discussion to-day and to-morrow, and so on until we come to a final vote.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest that this bill blocks up the way to reports by other committees. When we get them out of the way we can resume this report.

Mr. WILSON. That is the suggestion I made to the House yesterday. If we postpone it for a week the same difficulty will occur when that time arrives.

Mr. COX. I will say to the gentleman that the same difficulty will not occur. There are only about ten persons on this side of the House who wish to speak, and I think the gentleman will have no trouble in getting a vote as soon as the debate is exhausted.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; as soon as debate is exhausted. If we postpone it for a week, then progress will be blocked until the ten gentlemen upon that side of the House, and probably the same number upon this side, shall have discussed the resolution; so that we shall accomplish no advancement by a postponement. If the gentleman from Maine submits his remarks to-day we will have one speech out of the way.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman if he proposes to allow amendments to be offered to this bill, or does he propose to call the previous question?

Mr. WILSON. I stated to the House yesterday that I intended to call the previous question.

Mr. COX. Without allowing amendments to come in?

Mr. WILSON. If the previous question is sustained it will cut off amendments.

Mr. COX. I hope it will be the disposition of the other side to allow amendments, though that does not seem to be their purpose just now.

Mr. WILSON. In endeavoring to bring this resolution to final action I have not had any purpose to cut off the other side of the House from full discussion or from amendment any more from this side of the House. The course which I propose to pursue in relation to this resolution falls with equal force upon this side of the House as upon the other side.

Mr. GANSON. As I am not upon either side of the House, I would ask the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Wilson,] the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, what is the occasion for immediate action on this resolution?

Mr. WILSON. I have already stated, and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has stated, that the pendency of this joint resolution prevents the introduction of reports from other committees.

Mr. GANSON. We can postpone the consideration of this resolution, can we not?

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent.

Mr. GANSON. I hope we shall consent to postpone it.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to a postponement by consent if the House will fix a time for final action upon this resolution. But by postponement without such arrangement we lose just the time intervening between this and the time when the resolution shall come before the House for final action.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say simply in regard to this matter, and I think it may ease somewhat the restlessness which the chairman of the Judiciary Committee has manifested from the time he introduced this measure upon the floor, that there are several gentlemen upon this side of the House—I do not know how many or how few—who desire to say something on this question. As soon as the members on this side have been heard as much as they desire, then the gentleman can get a vote. We will not abuse our rights or privileges in this House, but we intend to indulge in legitimate and proper debate for a proper time, and if the gentleman from Iowa cannot make up his mind to allow that privilege, we will enforce it by the rules with which we became familiar in the last Congress. We will enter into no arrangement upon the subject. Whenever the course of debate is through, the House—and we are a part of the House and to be consulted—will be ready to take the vote. There is no disposition to abuse the patience of the House, but this is a very important measure, and we desire to discuss it in a proper and fair manner. I hope, therefore, that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee will make up his mind to let this favorite measure of his take the usual course.

Mr. WILSON. This is no favorite measure of mine; it is a report from the Committee on the Judiciary. The House may take such course in regard to it as it deems proper; but for myself, under the operation of the threat of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] I will make no arrangement whatever. I will not be driven or threatened into any arrangement.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have no disposition to threaten or to drive the gentleman. I intended merely to intimate to him that we are apprised of our rights, and that, in a proper manner, we are prepared to maintain them.

Mr. ELIOT. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. SWEAT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SWEAT then addressed the House for an hour. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I wish to say that the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] whose remarks have been aimed at by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SWEAT,] is confined to his room by illness.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will move that we go into committee.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I yield for that purpose.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, moved that an amendment to the bill concerning the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, which he proposed to submit at the proper time, be ordered to be printed; which motion was agreed to.

BOUNTY TO DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

Mr. LOVEJOY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing bounty to soldiers honorably discharged on account of sickness contracted in the line of duty; and that they be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

UNITED STATES PILOTAGE LAWS.

Mr. CHANLER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of compiling and printing the laws of the United States relating to pilots and pilotage, and report the same to this House.

JOSEPH A. WRIGHT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, presented to the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting copies of a letter and report of Joseph A. Wright, of Indiana, who attended the International Agricultural Exhibition at Hamburg last year, &c.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to refer that message to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was not agreed to.

The message was then referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, announced to the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the concurrent resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee on the conduct of the war.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is to add to the following amendment, offered by Mr. FERNANDO WOOD—

Provided further, That all spirits on hand and for sale, whether distilled prior to the date of this act or not, shall be subject to the rates of duty provided by this act, from and after the 12th day of January, 1864, except that such spirits as shall have been already taxed under the law approved July 17, 1832, shall not pay more than the additional increased tax provided for by this act—

the following proviso:

And provided further, That manufacturers shall not be required to pay any additional tax over and above the amount imposed by the act of 1862 upon any spirits manufactured by them prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] has not been spoken to in opposition; and if so, I will say a word upon it. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, and to all similar amendments. His amendment proposes to impose a duty upon that which has already paid duties and has the stamp of the Government upon it, and has been sold under governmental authority, wherever it may be. Now, I hold that to be not only unjust, but as in palpable violation of the implied contract of the Government, as much so as it is possible to make it. Congress specifies certain things which shall pay a duty, and they order a stamp to be put upon them when that duty is paid. Whoever did that had a right to suppose they would not be further taxed thereon; any attempt to put a duty upon anything of that kind, whether liquor or anything else, is an atrocious injustice which ought not to be perpetrated by this House. I shall therefore vote against every such proposition; and my colleague on the committee, [Mr. PENDLETON,] if he can get the floor, will offer an amendment distinctly setting forth that principle for the purpose of removing all chance of mistaking what the bill means.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I want to inquire if the same injustice does not actually, if not legally, operate upon the manufacturer of spirits if this additional tax is put upon that which is already manufactured, and which was made under an implied contract with the Government that it should only pay so much duty?

Mr. STEVENS. It does, and it is unjust to impose this increased tax upon them. Hence the committee intended to impose it only upon what is manufactured after this bill was reported. The committee have not expressed their views quite as clearly as they designed, and hence the amendment I have suggested, and which my colleague from Ohio intends to offer in order to make the matter more clear. I feel as the gentleman from Illinois feels, that it would be as unjust to impose this tax upon a manufacturer who has paid the duty, as it would be to impose it upon a man who has the article in store with the stamp of the Government upon it.

I say this now, sir, because I do not want to be answering all these propositions. I hope the House will understand what the committee has done, and will vote down all amendments which attempt to impose a tax contrary to this principle.

Mr. LOVEJOY. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move as an amendment to strike out from section first all after "further" in the nineteenth line, and insert:

That no duties authorized by this act shall be imposed or collected upon any spirits distilled before the 1st day of March, 1864, on which duties shall have been paid under the act of July 1, 1862, or which shall have been reported for the payment of duty pursuant to said act.

Mr. Chairman, I am not only opposed to any retroactive effect of this bill, but I think that it should be made prospective. I represent a district largely interested in the distillation of spirits.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I submit to the Chair whether the amendment offered by my colleague to the amendment offered by myself to this bill is germane and in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] has offered this amendment in lieu of the amendment of his colleague, which is in order.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. As a substitute? The CHAIRMAN. Yes, as a substitute for the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Mr. Chairman, the State of New York manufactures more than one fourth of the entire amount of distilled spirits produced in this Union. In that manufacture it becomes necessary for the interests of the manufacturer not only to invest large amounts of capital directly in the business, but also to make large investments in stock, in cattle and hogs, which are kept on hand for the purpose of being fed by the products of the distillery.

At a meeting of gentlemen in the State of New York whose interests are involved in this manufacture to a very large extent, men who are ready to sustain this Government in all its measures to put down this rebellion, men who are ready to meet their full burden of taxation, and in whatever shape it may come, they appealed to Congress to protect them against the effect of any act which shall not give them time to dispose of their property and to adjust their interests to the new condition of things.

I have learned from many of these gentlemen, respectable and reliable men, that when the original act was passed imposing a tax of twenty cents per gallon, almost every distillery in the State of New York was suspended by that act for a period of nearly six months, and that they have made no profit and derived no benefit from the business, except that in view of the new duty to be imposed upon this production the market was stimulated by speculation.

Now, sir, speculation has put up the price of this spirit, and these men who have these large investments on hand—thousands and millions of bushels of grain—have also their stock, cattle, and hogs, and they apprehend that if this measure be passed speedily, and this tax be imposed upon them without giving them an opportunity to adjust their business, they will have to make very heavy sacrifices, which they are quite unable to bear.

Now, I doubt the policy, in any act of this character, of putting it in force without full and fair notice to the country at large, and, at this time, I doubt the policy and expediency or the justice of saying that this act shall go into operation to-day, or that it shall go into operation on the 12th day of January, 1864, when this is the only measure which has been before this House on the subject of internal revenue. Taxes, sir, should be uniform, and I take it that it is not the policy of this Government to lay a heavy load upon any one interest, but so to adjust its revenue measures that every industrial pursuit and vocation shall bear its fair and equitable, and only its fair and equitable, proportion of the public burden.

Now, sir, if the 1st day of March next be fixed, as my amendment proposes, a portion of the intervening time will be consumed before this bill becomes a law, and we shall give these men and these interests fair notice; we shall give them an opportunity of adjusting their business and running out this stock which they might otherwise not be able to dispose of except at a ruinous sacrifice, and a great interest in this country will be protected.

Mr. PIKE. I do not understand the theory of taxation to be as the gentleman from Pennsylvania states it, which is that when a tax is imposed it is in the nature of a contract that an additional tax shall not be imposed upon the same article. I understand the theory of taxation to be simply this, that the Government takes as much as its necessities for the time require, and the only contract about it is, that it will go no further and take no more than its necessities require. That being the theory, the simple question in this case is, do the necessities of the Government require us to procure this sum of money from taxation on this article?

Mr. STEVENS. I raise the point of order that the gentleman from Maine is not speaking to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine will confine his remarks to opposing the amendment.

Mr. PIKE. It is calculated that there are from twenty-five to thirty million gallons of spirits on which this amendment will operate, and which will produce a revenue of from ten to twelve million dollars, and which the Government will not obtain if this tax be made prospective. That is an important consideration; and the question before the committee now is whether it will vote in the amendment in order to obtain this revenue.

Mr. Chairman, as the action of last Congress has been referred to, I want to say a word about it. At last Congress we made the internal revenue bill simply prospective. There was a discussion then as to whether it should not be made retroactive. I voted at that time in favor of taxing the stock on hand, and that proposition was carried in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. But it was subsequently defeated in the House. But mark the ground on which it was defeated. There were two reasons alleged against it. One was the difficulty of collection. We had no internal revenue officers appointed at that time. The bill which laid the tax provided for the appointment of a large number of officers. Of course delay would occur from the time of the passage of the law until its machinery should be put in operation. That objection does not apply to this measure. We have the full machinery now in operation, and of course the revenue officers can gather up all the necessary statistics on which to assess and collect this tax. The other reason then assigned was, that the revenue derived from the bill would amount to $150,000,000; besides $100,000,000 which it was supposed would be derived from customs on imports, and that this revenue would be sufficient for wants which were regarded as temporary.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to correct the gentleman from Maine on that point. The Committee of Ways and Means made no estimate over $100,000,000.

Mr. PIKE. I do not recollect the precise estimate of the Committee of Ways and Means. I did not share the expectations that I speak of, but I know they were very general among the members of the House with whom I conversed. These expectations were that the revenue would amount at least to $250,000,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, both these reasons which influenced the action of the last House do not apply to our present action. The Lord knows our necessities oblige us, for the present and the future, to obtain as much revenue as we can; and we know that the present law does not yield sufficient revenue, and that we shall be obliged to raise more wherever we can. I am, therefore, in favor of the extremest taxation, stopping short only of that which shall be synonymous with oppression.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] by striking out all which he proposes to insert. The amendment which he offered proposes, as I understand, to strike out all after the word "provided" in the nineteenth line, and to insert what he offers. I move as an amendment to his amendment, to strike out all which he proposes to insert. The effect of it will be to strike out from the text of the original bill the last proviso in it, and the effect of that will be to place the tax recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means only on such stock of liquors as may be distilled after the 12th day of the current month. I wish gentlemen to understand that the object of my amendment is to bring the committee immediately to a vote on the question whether or not it will tax the stock of liquor on hand at the time the bill was reported at the rate prescribed in the bill itself.

I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer this amendment because the committee thinks that it carries out more fully than the present bill the idea which it has in its mind, and which is to make the new rate of taxation operative only on such stocks as shall be created after that time. The committee was anxious to avoid imposing the additional tax on stocks of spirits which had been distilled prior to the 12th of this month. The committee desires to carry out the principle of the law adopted in the last Congress, which was that the tax should be made operative only in the future. I have been instructed to offer this amendment, and I design to follow it up, if successful, by another still further to perfect the bill.

I shall not argue the question which is submitted to this committee, and which has been already argued, but I want to put it to the gentlemen in a practical form. When we come to that portion of the bill as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means which imposes an additional duty upon cotton manufactures I want to know if gentlemen will carry out the same principle and impose the same additional tax on all cotton goods on hand; for to be consistent, if the principle of the amendment of the gentleman from New York be adopted it must apply to all the goods on hand of every description the tax on which is to be increased by this bill. I want gentlemen to understand that the principle must run through all their legislation if it is adopted; that it cannot be applied to a single article of manufacture and excluded from others. If an increased tax is to be imposed upon spirits manufactured, it must also apply to cotton, to petroleum, and to every other article mentioned in the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman, but I believe he is speaking to no amendment.

Mr. PENDLETON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have submitted an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to remark that the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio cannot properly be entertained as an amendment.

Mr. PENDLETON. My motion is to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York by striking out what the gentleman proposes to insert.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the gentleman from Ohio is merely the negative of the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PENDLETON. Do I understand, then, that my amendment is ruled out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the proposition of the gentleman is no amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York by striking out the last three words; and I do it for the purpose of submitting a remark or two upon the question now before the committee.

I remark, incidentally, that I do not quite concur with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] who is usually very accurate in his recollection, in respect to the conclusions reached by the Committee of Ways and Means.

But in respect to the question now submitted, I find that some gentlemen seem to be laboring under the impression that there is in the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] submitted yesterday to the House, a novelty which is a violation of a just principle of legislation. But I claim distinctly that Congress has the right to regulate its legislation, imposing taxes according to the necessities of the public Treasury, and according to the conditions of commerce in respect to the articles to be affected by the tax. The duty is to be advanced or diminished as the revenue requires, and as it may affect favorably or unfavorably the trade in the article upon which it is imposed. It is the right exercised by all Governments, everywhere, and all transactions of commerce are subject to it.

The amount of the tax varies from year to year. The history of British legislation on the subject of distilled spirits may be cited in proof of this. Their tables, which I have examined, show that they commenced in 1791 with a tax of three shillings and fourpence per gallon, steadily increased until it reached nearly twelve shillings, and then falling back to seven shillings, and up again to ten shillings, where it now stands, ($2.42). I have not been able to find the rate prevailing in 1842, when the revenue from this source reached $5,179,000; but the last previous rate shown in the tables examined was seven shillings and sixpence ($1.85) per gallon. From this amount of revenue the sum realized in 1861 from a rate of ten shillings per gallon ($2.42) rose to £9,225,000, and at the same rate in 1862 to £9,618,000. The English system makes a distinction between spirits used as a beverage and spirits used for mechanical and manufacturing purposes. The latter is not taxed; but under regulations established by law is methylated or odorized in a manner which effectually prevents its use as a beverage. Now, sir, it is evident that the temptation to consumption of spirits in England is identical with that in the United States. Yet under a system of constantly increasing taxation the revenue has been increased and the consumption not diminished. This is sufficient to show that we do not stop the source of the revenue by increasing the rate, as has been claimed by gentlemen demanding a reduction of the proposed rate. I have seen a statement showing the amount of money realized at retail from the sale of a gallon of whisky. My friend from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY,] who represents a large distilling interest, knows that the usual price paid for a drink is ten cents.

Mr. LOVEJOY. We pay only six cents where I live.

Mr. KASSON. Well, sir, computed at five cents a drink, a gallon of whisky yields between six and seven dollars. The price is now nearly a dollar a gallon at wholesale—certainly a large margin for profit. This rate of sixty cents, therefore, would be about three and one third mills on a glass. This of course cannot change the price at the small retailer's, as has been claimed.

In further proof that there is no novelty of legislation in imposing a tax on the stock on hand, I cite an act of Parliament, passed in August, 1860, now in my hand, which imposed one rate to take effect on the previous 29th of February, and another rate to be applied again from the 17th of July of the same year. In the last section of the act it makes special provision for the case of time contracts, contracts for future delivery, requiring the tax in such case to be paid by the purchaser. It reads as follows:

"And whereas contracts or agreements may have been made for the sale or delivery of some of the goods or commodities on which increased or additional duties of excise are by this act granted and imposed, which contracts or agreements may have been made with no reference to such additional duties, and thereby the several contractors may be materially affected; for remedy thereof be it enacted, that every person who shall have made or entered into any such contract or agreement, shall be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered, in the case of any such contract or agreement, to add so much money as will be equivalent to the increased or additional duty hereby granted on such goods or commodities respectively to the price thereof, and shall be entitled by virtue of this act to be paid and to sue and recover the same accordingly."

These facts show conclusively that no novelty is involved in the amendment, and that contracts for future delivery can be provided for, and that the rate is a very moderate duty.

Now, sir, what is the effect of this increased duty upon spirits on the distiller if you fail to adopt the principle of legislation proposed by the gentleman from New York? A large accumulated stock is on hand. You add by this section of the bill an increased tax of forty cents per gallon upon all spirits to be hereafter manufactured; and until that accumulated stock is exhausted, you shut up every distillery in the country, because you supply to the holder of stock on hand a margin of forty cents per gallon profit, on which the holder of this accumulated stock, or the forestaller, may prevent a gallon from being manufactured, or a gallon manufactured from being put into the market, unless he may see fit to hold back until the price reaches a point at which it can be manufactured. The speculator, with this margin, keeps the new product of the distiller from the market, until the accumulated stock is consumed, and shuts the distillery for six or nine months, during which no new product is created as the basis of a revenue. Not only is the proposition as contained in the original bill a gross injustice to the distiller, in effect shutting up every distillery in the country, or leaving the distiller at the mercy of the speculator, but you cut off all revenue from this source until the stock on hand shall be exhausted.

There is no difficulty, therefore, in this amendment in point of law, nor in respect to its justice and expediency as a measure of revenue. The proposition of the bill, without the amendment, will operate as a gross injustice and hardship to the distiller, and inure exclusively to the benefit of the speculator. I ask the House to examine this with more care. Injustice is done to the Government and to the manufacturer by the original bill. Equalizing the price of the article in whatever hands it may be will do injustice to nobody. I am in favor of the amendment, therefore, as required by the principle of justice, and necessary to the revenues of the Government.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Chairman, the closing remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat assert the ground upon which my amendment was proposed—to do justice, to establish an equitable principle, and to produce a revenue; and I am surprised that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. STREYENS,] a committee raised for the purpose of providing revenue for the Government, should rise here and oppose a proposition the effect of which will increase our revenue from ten to fifteen million dollars a year—a proposition that is legal, that has the benefit of precedent, that is intended to discriminate in favor of no particular class, that bears equally upon all classes, and that provides against any possible evasion of this proposed tax by any class of individuals who have anticipated the action of the Government. Gentlemen seem to have gone upon the idea that there is no Congress of the United States, and that the declaration of a subordinate officer was law involving millions of dollars of property. It seems to be the presumption that any duty may be fixed by them—that we are expected to carry out what subordinate officers of the Government may determine upon in advance. I want those gentlemen to understand that the Congress of the United States does the legislation for the United States; that it is only sufficient for the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to recommend, and that it is necessary for those recommendations to be ratified by this Congress.

When we propose in the discharge of our duty an amendment to this bill, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means tells us that we must vote down every amendment offered, because, forsooth, an amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means must be passed, and the only argument adduced is that a certain portion of liquor has been marked by the Government. Gentlemen can dispose of that, and it is unnecessary for me to refer to it. I only say that if we desire revenue, and if we desire to collect it equitably and fairly, if we wish to discharge our duty in relation to whisky, we should say what the duty shall be, and prevent monopoly and an effort to forestall to the detriment of the honest dealer by those who mouse around the Departments, and obtain information which is denied to others. We desire only that revenue shall be equalized upon all—

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out the last word of the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if the thing can be done, I hope that the ingenious gentleman who proposed it will tell the House how it can be done. Our experience is the reverse. We collected a duty on only about thirty-two million gallons up to the 1st of October. I think that the ingenuity of the gentleman here would be much better expended in showing how we can collect the duties that we actually levy, rather than in increasing them. I do not know that it is a great matter so far as the principle is involved, for we have violated it in regard to this article of property by levying a tax upon it of three hundred per cent. of its value, while on other articles we levy only three per cent. We should observe some symmetry and some rule in our legislation. If you undertake to collect a tax upon articles already manufactured, why shall we not go into New York and any other city or place where they have imported foreign liquors and levy and collect a duty upon them? We enhance the value as much upon foreign importations as we do that of the domestic article.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MORRILL. I have only five minutes, and I cannot yield to the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, if we are to lay down the principle that we are to collect duty upon a few manufactures on the retroactive principle, I take it to be an instruction, when the Committee of Ways and Means act in future on matters of general revenue, that they shall carry it out. Why not? Is not there as much justice in collecting tax on the manufacture of tobacco or cigars or petroleum or of cotton and woolen goods as upon anything else? If the idea of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] is to be adopted, that we are to levy tax because we want it, without observing any principle of justice, then we can come to that question. But I do not believe that the interests of the Government have yet reached a point where we are not required to follow any principle of justice at all. But I do believe that we can perfect the laws so that we can collect much more revenue than we have received; and to that point, and to that mainly, I think the committee wish this House to bestow its attention.

Mr. PIKE. I rise for the purpose of giving to the committee some statistics which I received this morning in the shape of a circular from the chief grain exporters at Chicago. I had supposed that all the members had received a similar one; but on inquiry I find they have not. Some of the statements are very important, and I wish to call the attention of the committee to them for a few moments. It is stated that the capacity of the distilleries to produce liquors, which has been very much enlarged of late, and is now quickened to its utmost limits, is two million three hundred and sixty-six thousand gallons a day; that this branch of manufacture has been so largely exercised, in view of the probable tax to be imposed at this session, that the amount now on hand is equivalent to one year's consumption. Here is the statement:

"Since the report of the Committee of Ways and Means of January 12, it is conceded by the distillers that the stock on hand is equivalent to one year's consumption, and that all the distilleries will run hereafter to alcohol, on which the Government receives no taxes, and the result will be equal to the stoppage of all the distilleries. The distillers claim, if they stop, corn will decline from forty to fifty cents per bushel."

The same result will obtain as that spoken of by the gentleman from New York, when in last Congress we imposed a tax of twenty cents upon a gallon of whisky, and did not tax that on hand—all the distilleries stopped until the stock on hand was consumed. That result would follow in this case, only that in this case the amount on hand is so much enlarged that we should have to wait for months, until nearly the expiration of the year, before we should begin to receive any additional tax. That, in my judgment, forms a very strong reason why we should not give away this ten or twelve million dollars which we have now the legal right to assess upon, a class of people abundantly able to pay it.

Mr. MORRILL withdrew his amendment.

Mr. ALLEY. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] by striking out the last word.

I move the amendment for the purpose of enabling me to say a single word upon this matter. I am strongly inclined, as the gentlemen composing the Committee of Ways and Means well know, to follow not only their lead in all matters which have come before the committee and received their investigation, but also to follow the lead of all committees of this House who have given to subjects which come before them that attention which they deserve. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments of gentlemen who have answered those which came from gentlemen on the other side of the House in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York. They have failed to convince me that there is any force whatever in their reasons.

Some gentlemen upon this side of the House have spoken of the amount involved as being ten or twelve million dollars. From the investigation I have given it, and from all the statistics I have seen, I believe this additional tax will involve an amount of from twenty to twenty-five million dollars upon the stock now on hand.

What is the practical result of the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means? It is practically to tax the people twenty or twenty-five millions and put it into the hands of speculators. On the other hand, what is the practical effect of the proposition of the gentleman from New York? It is to take twenty or twenty-five millions out of the people and put it into the hands of the Government. It is that, and it is nothing else; and in that view I certainly think it commends itself to the sense and justice of every person who has examined fully the subject. And I must say I am astonished at the argument of the Committee of Ways and Means. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has just stated that a duty on only about thirty-two million gallons was collected previous to October, and therefore he argues that if this tax is put upon the present stock it will be impossible to collect it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I infer from that fact just the opposite. I believe that in consequence of the exemption of the stock on hand at the time of the passage of the original bill, that and that alone was the reason why we have had a tax collected upon only thirty-two million gallons. If that exemption had not been in the bill, I believe that the tax upon that, as upon many other articles, would have been vastly more than it was, and that is a reason, in my judgment, so far as it has any effect at all, for putting a tax upon all the stock now on hand.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I believe it is sound policy at the present time that we should so levy our taxes that the people will cheerfully respond and pay them. I think that it is sound policy for us to so shape the law that it will not create a disgust and hatred against the Government in consequence of the mode or manner of taxation or the time at which these taxes are levied.

Now, if this proposition to levy the tax upon whatever may be on hand should unfortunately carry, I say to you in all seriousness that your law cannot be enforced without double the number of internal tax-gatherers that we now have. It is utterly impossible that the tax can be collected under the law we now have upon the statute-book, or by the number of officers that we now employ.

Look again at the amount of illicit trade that it will create. Why, a man living upon the border line of Canada, if this tax shall be imposed, can make over a dollar a day by just carrying a single gallon of alcohol across the lines. I do not want that at this time we should induce that kind of operation. I believe that it would be unfortunate for the country if we should do it.

Mr. Chairman, we have already tried an experiment in this unique kind of legislation. It will be remembered that at the last session this House, against the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means, levied a license tax upon lottery-venders of $1,000, and then levied a tax of fifty per cent. upon the amount of the tickets sold. The consequence has been that the Government has not received a single dollar from that source, while it is notorious that the business is being carried on, being authorized by several of the States, to the same extent as formerly. I hope the House will so fix its legislation at this time upon the great subject of taxation that the people at home will not rise in revolution against it.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. FERNANDO WOOD'S amendment.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I believe I have said all I desire to say upon this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order unless he proposes an amendment.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Well, I move to strike out all but the first word of the amendment. We all remember, sir, the fable of the goose that laid the golden eggs. I fear that we are in danger of doing something very like that.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I rise to a point of order. Is the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out what has not been adopted by the House in order?

The CHAIRMAN. He proposes to strike out a portion of the amendment so as to mature the amendment, which is in order.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I am informed by those who understand this subject thoroughly, and who, I have no doubt, state the case as it is, that it is utterly impossible, with the present machinery and under the present law in regard to the collection of these taxes, to enforce any such provision as that. I am informed on what I conceive to be good authority that a law like this will absolutely break up a large portion of the distilleries in my State.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that some of the distillers from my State or from my own district make the point that the bill as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means will break up their distilleries.

Mr. LOVEJOY. My colleague must not use up all my time.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say in response to the gentleman from Illinois that we had before the Committee of Ways and Means a large number of gentlemen, and without a single exception they were for a lower duty than what the committee reported.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That has nothing to do with the question which I put to my colleague.

Mr. LOVEJOY. The argument of the gentleman is that this would be unjust to the distillers. I suppose they ought to know what will injure them, and what not. If my colleague has any exceptional cases in his district, of course he understands that better than I do. In my own district is manufactured more than half of that which is manufactured in the State.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no doubt of that, and I think that more than half of it is drank also in the gentleman's district.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Then I hope the House will hold out no inducement for them to act so in the future.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the amendment offered by my colleague. It appears to me that this whole question lies in a nutshell, though I do not pretend to so much information on this subject as the Committee of Ways and Means must have. To my mind the proposition is very simple. It is whether we shall levy this tax on parties who hold stocks of the article, or whether, letting them go free, put the amount of tax in their pockets which they will collect out of the consumer. It is the few speculators in whisky against the great mass of consumers. I hold in my hand a copy of the document referred to by my friend from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] coming from the State which my colleague and myself have the honor, in part, to represent. It is a memorial sent to me by an esteemed friend from Chicago. The proposition is stated on the title-page very distinctly. It is this:

"The only true way to tax is to tax all wines and alcohols sold after such a date, crediting to all that has been paid on, the amount so paid. Capitalists have no more right to have their capital exempted from a tax because they have it in whisky than if it were in railroad stock. Has Congress the right to legislate (as it certainly would be doing if they should tax all made after date) in favor of capital invested in whisky, and against the best interests of the country at large? Would not such legislation be creating a privileged class, exempt from taxation, though not investing them with titles?"

And now, one word in reference to the effect which this thing would have on distillers. Here is a statement presented in this memorial which goes to confirm very strongly the position taken by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] It says:

"It is believed that with the estimated stock on hand April 1, 1864, being a six months' supply, all distillers will stop until that supply is nearly worked off, for the reason that the stock on hand can be sold at twenty cents per gallon cheaper than the distiller can afford to sell wines manufactured subsequent to that date. The only points they would be likely to continue to manufacture would be those to which wines would cost more to be transported than the distiller could furnish at and pay the forty cents tax. Such points, in the aggregate, would not exceed one eighth of the estimated number—thirteen hundred."

There are various other propositions and statistics laid down in this memorial which are certainly very interesting; and if we had time I would read the statement to the committee to show the practical operation of this proposition to exempt from taxation the stock of liquors on hand. I merely wish now to call the attention of the committee to some of these propositions, and to state that in my opinion nothing is more just or more righteous than to tax the liquor on hand. The interest of the holders and speculators is antagonistic to the interests of the people and to the interests of the Treasury; and I am for the people and for replenishing the Treasury by all just and proper legislation.

The question being on Mr. LOVEJOY'S amendment, Mr. LOVEJOY withdrew it.

Mr. STEVENS. I renew the amendment. I desire to say in regard to that portion which refers to distillers that numerous committees from them were before the Committee of Ways and Means, every one of which, without a single exception, protested against imposing a tax on the stock of liquor on hand. There is probably some person having a large stock on hand whom it is proposed to reach in this way. It is all in a nutshell. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] has succeeded very well, I think, in what he proposed to accomplish, which was to distract this side of the House, put the responsibility of the act upon us, and so get his party into power. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I am willing to take my share of the responsibility.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew the amendment. I do not know that I understand exactly what the gentleman from Pennsylvania means, and if I am wrong I wish to be corrected. It makes no difference to me who it is that offers an amendment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] has offered an amendment which appeals to my sense of what is proper. I recognize it just as important coming from him as if it had been offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] If the amendment be wrong in principle I desire some gentleman on this side of the House or on the other to show it; and when that shall be shown I will vote against it. In the mean time I shall go for it. I do not understand, I have never understood, that if I buy a horse I do so under a quasi contract with the Government that there never will be a higher tax put upon that horse than existed when I bought him. It seems to me that what gentlemen have been saying here this morning is based upon that fallacy—upon the supposition that when a person purchases anything or produces anything liable to taxation the Government is under contract to him not to tax that thing any more than it was taxed at the time he bought it or produced it.

Now, what are the facts in the case before us? Since the passage of the act of August, 1862, taxing liquors, nearly all the surplus corn and rye in the country has been distilled, and millions of gallons of liquor are now in the country in the hands of speculators. Upon that stock it is proposed by the gentleman from New York to levy an additional tax for the purposes of revenue.

But gentlemen tell us there is a quasi contract which the Government has entered into with these distillers and dealers, that it will not tax liquors any more until it has given them due notice.

Now, I do not recognize any such principle of legislation, or any such obligation on the part of the Government of the United States. Every man owns and produces property with the understanding that the Government has the right to tax it, and I propose that we shall exercise that right now.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but I will put this question to him: suppose there is an import duty of, say, twenty or twenty-five per cent. upon a certain article of foreign merchandise, and with that understanding, I contract for the importation of a certain amount of that article; I ask the gentleman if it would be just for the Government to place an additional duty of twenty or twenty-five per cent. upon that article for which I had previously contracted?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman says he purchased with that understanding. I should like to ask who was the other party to that understanding?

Mr. LOVEJOY. The Government.

Mr. GARFIELD. With whatever understanding the gentleman purchased, there was none on the part of the Government that did not leave it perfectly at liberty to lay an additional tax if it so determined. I would consent to no doctrine that did not admit that principle.

Mr. BLAINE. Suppose the goods have already been imported and are lying in the bonded warehouse; does the gentleman hold that the Government would have the right to lay an additional tax upon the goods while lying in the warehouse?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir; the gentleman does hold that the Government would have the right to lay an additional tax upon them.

Mr. BLAINE. That is a new principle.

Mr. LOVEJOY. The question is not whether the property has been taxed, but whether the property has not been purchased with the understanding that no increased tax was to be imposed; and whether, under these circumstances, the Government has the right to increase the import tax upon the goods so purchased?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have already answered the gentleman's question; but the question before us is not one of importation, but one of internal revenue, and to that question I have addressed my remarks. Of course it might be right and proper for us to make some provision for contracts made under the old law and continuing yet.

But, Mr. Chairman, I object to the suggestions that have been made on this side of the House, that this amendment should not prevail because it came from the gentleman from New York. I have no more love for that gentleman than many others here; but if we cannot meet the thing he proposes, let us not object to it because of the source from which it comes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRILL. A single word in opposition to the amendment to the amendment. If the House are determined to override the principles involved in the bill as reported, let me say that they will not collect the tax they propose to lay on this manufactured article principally from speculators. Most of them sell out when they can obtain a reasonable amount of profit, and a great portion of this stock on hand has passed through from five to ten hands in the course of the increase of price at the present time.

But, leaving all other matters aside, I call the attention of the House back to the main point that if the proposition of the gentleman from New York is adopted it will be utterly impracticable to carry it into effect without an army of inspectors, a sort of smelling committee to go round into every man's premises to ascertain whether he has or has not liquor on hand. I will not take up the time of the House further with the matter.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for tellers upon Mr. Wood's amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PENDLETON and WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 30.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the word "sixty," and to insert in lieu thereof the word "forty," so as to impose a tax of forty cents per gallon instead of sixty cents. This amendment will not be in conflict with the amendment which has been adopted, applying the tax to the accumulated stock of manufactured spirits on hand, and which will render a larger tax than forty cents per gallon unnecessary.

I trust that gentlemen will consider the operation of this section upon a particular section of country. Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois are the great corn-growing States, and are the most affected by this tax. It will not affect materially the heavy capitalists, but it will most oppressively affect the small distillers—parties with small capital.

I warn gentlemen that if they insist upon raising the tax upon spirits to sixty cents per gallon they will decrease instead of increase the amount of revenue to be collected. If they do not, they will ruinously affect the corn-growing interest. The argument that a tax in Great Britain of $2 50 per gallon is imposed on spirits is no argument at all. The system of taxation in Great Britain does not in any sense correspond with our system. They have the advantage of an expanded colonial system and the immense system of commerce springing out of it to meet in multiplied form the home tax imposed upon their people. So much of their manufactured spirits as is used for other manufacturing purposes in the form of methylated spirits bears no tax whatever. One half of the spirits manufactured in that or this country would be so applied, so that the tax in that country is imposed only on a part of the spirits manufactured. But the people of Great Britain are taxed to the last extremity to pay the interest on a debt of $3,500,000,000. We certainly have not so soon reached a condition that gentlemen must go to Great Britain with her over-burdened population for precedents in taxation. The tax upon spirits should correspond with the tax upon other articles. It should not be beyond forty cents. This is double the former tax. But the bill proposes an increase of two hundred per cent. on the former tax.

I speak, Mr. Chairman, for the interests directly involved. My own district is as largely interested in this as any other district represented upon this floor, and I say, without hesitation, that to impose a duty of sixty cents must materially affect the interests of my constituents and will impose on the Northwest burdens which are not equally borne by the East. If gentlemen who represent the manufacturing districts of the country, such as the manufacture of cotton and woolen fabrics, and the manufacturers of iron—if they are willing to run the risk by the imposition of a corresponding duty on those commodities there would be some show of fairness. But will such be the case? I tell gentlemen if they intend to increase the tax two hundred per cent. on manufactured spirits we shall expect to see a corresponding increase of tax imposed upon other manufacturing interests. If the manufacture of the Northwest is to be taxed so heavily, a corresponding rate of increase must be imposed on the manufactures of New England and Pennsylvania. Or will gentlemen tax us without limit for the benefit of their own section?

Mr. Chairman, I know something of these distillers and of their sentiments. When we levied a tax on the tax upon them they paid it without complaint. They are an enterprising and patriotic body of men. I am assured by the most intelligent of this class of citizens—and they embrace some of our most intelligent and successful business men—that if you increase the duty beyond forty cents a large number of distilleries in the Northwest must be suspended. I know that that will be the case in many instances. You will drive men into pursuits not so unreasonably taxed. My own district has paid during the current year $700,000 of tax on manufactured spirits, a larger duty than has been paid, I think, by any other congressional district on this particular article of taxation.

I hope that gentlemen will discriminate between the condition of this and foreign countries where it is alleged that an increase of tax has increased production and revenue. You cannot by taxation stimulate industry. I hope that they will not create difficulty and jealousies by imposing this heavy tax on an article of western industry by an unjust discrimination. Let them not put an additional tax upon the manufacture of spirits without at least a corresponding increase of taxation on the taxable products of other sections. I protest against what I believe is intended to be a discrimination against one section of the country by increasing the tax threefold without a corresponding increase upon the burdens of other sections.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that we should consider this in a common-sense view, as we do all other questions. I am disposed to assail the idea that it is within the constitutional power of this body to legislate for the correction of morals and practices in the States. Laws bearing upon that subject are within the province of the State Legislatures. I therefore do not think that temperance speeches are properly delivered in this Hall. If, however, they are to be delivered, we might have evening service for such purposes as those for which the Hall was used by a lady not long since.

I will use the remaining portion of my five minutes in talking on the question. The proposition is to levy upon distillers of spirits, such as are ordinarily manufactured in the States, a tax of about three times the value of the article. Whisky would not be worth in the market, as it comes from the distillers, more than twenty-five cents per gallon. You propose a tax of sixty cents per gallon. I know that when the tax of twenty cents was proposed, several distillers of my district closed their distilleries because they could not bear the burden, but they recuperated, however, by time and circumstances and recommenced manufacturing. I say to the House that in all that region of country—and I may be expected to know something about whisky, according to the idea of the other side, being a Democrat—the tax here proposed will destroy all reasonable prospects of obtaining revenue, by closing up the distilleries.

Mr. KASSON. I could not hear distinctly the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, but I gather their purport to be that by this tax you will embarrass or destroy the production of this article, that you will render the price so disproportionate to the value of the article as to operate injustice in that way.

Speaking to those, I wish to say we have evidence that the price of the article is now necessarily and permanently different from the price of the article at the commencement of the system of taxation. It is now nearly a dollar a gallon. The extraordinary production shows that the imposition of the tax heretofore has in no degree retarded its production, or, as far as I know, retarded its consumption.

What is the tax when you come to estimate in detail? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Lovejoy] is well aware that the price per drink is ten cents.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Six cents in my country.

Mr. KASSON. At the value of five cents per drink the yield of a gallon of whisky is estimated, in the papers I have examined, to be between six and seven dollars, when it actually reaches the consumer in the ordinary way. You have here a very large margin of profits; enough to show that this charge of three and one third mills per drink proposed to be imposed is very moderate.

Upon the subject of consumption, gentlemen well know that the temptation to consumption in this country is identical with that in England. In England they divide wines into beverages and methylene spirits, which latter are used for manufacturing purposes. That which is methylene is not the subject of a tax. That used for beverages is subject to a tax varying in amount, and generally increasing. In examining the statistics I find under a rate of tax which I believe to be about seven shillings and sixpence in 1830—I have not been able to find the rate in 1842—the revenue in the United Kingdom was £5,000,000 sterling. In 1861, under a tax of ten shillings per gallon, or about two and a half dollars, the yield was £9,000,000 and upward. Under the same tax in 1862 the yield was £9,600,000.

I state these facts to show—the conditions of consumption being the same in both countries—that the imposition of the highest tax does not embarrass or even restrict the consumption of the article. And it shows that the amount of tax proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means is exceedingly moderate, and will affect nobody except the man who gets the last profit before it reaches the consumer.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ARNOLD. I move to amend the amendment by reducing the amount one cent. I offer the amendment for the purpose of enabling me to say a single word in regard to the great question before the committee—that of revenue. The object of this bill is an increase of the revenue. With very great deference to those gentlemen of the Ways and Means who have investigated this subject, I am advised by those who ought to know, that the rate reported by that committee is so high that it will drive large numbers of those now engaged in the business out of it; and that instead of increasing the revenue from that source it will entirely, or to a very considerable extent, destroy it.

It is with a view to get before the committee the statement of those largely engaged in the manufacture of spirits that I have risen, and I will ask that the statement upon that subject which I have sent to the Clerk's desk be read, simply saying that it comes from gentlemen of experience, and whose character for truth I am willing to indorse.

The statement was read, as follows:

The undersigned, distillers of the city of Chicago, would respectfully present to the committee on revenue the following facts in relation to the distillation of high-wines:

In the city of Chicago there are four distilleries, which in the aggregate consume daily seven thousand two hundred and fifty bushels of grain, of a quality mostly unfit for any other use, producing therefrom about thirty thousand gallons of high-wines. In the sheds of the said distilleries there are at present seven thousand head of cattle in a half fattened condition. The question presented to the committee is, simply, how to derive the greatest amount of revenue from the high-wines with the least burden to the manufacturers, and we propose to present some data to enable the committee to arrive at a proper solution of the question.

We think that revenue, to be productive, should be graduated in such a manner that the largest amount can be raised upon given articles, and the manufacturer still be able to continue their production. So soon as the amount of the excise levied upon any article, coupled with the cost of its manufacture, exceeds its price in the market, then the manufacturer must stop producing. This conclusion is inevitable, since no person in his sober senses will continue to sink his capital merely for the patriotic purpose of paying revenue to the Government.

To illustrate the argument: let us take a distillery running one thousand bushels of grain and making four thousand gallons of high-wines per day; such a one now pays to the Government a daily excise of $800. When this was first laid, so heavily did it press upon manufacturers of high-wines that some were compelled to run their distilleries for alcohol for a period of six months, for foreign exportation, before the trade of the country became assimilated to even the comparative low excise of twenty cents upon the gallon, and enabled them to manufacture high-wines for home consumption. Judging from this fact, we are of the opinion that if the high excise of between sixty cents and one dollar be laid upon high-wines it will result in shutting up every distillery in our city, so soon as, by the manufacture of alcohol, they can get their half-fattened beves out of their barns without total loss. On the contrary, should a tax of forty cents be laid by the Government, it will enable the manufacturer to continue his business, and not close his distillery.

We ask the committee whether they will recommend a high excise, thus closing our distilleries and cutting off the revenue to the Government, or will place the excise at such a figure as will enable us to continue our business and pay a large revenue to the Government.

We are willing to pay all our manufacture will stand, and to do our best, in common with our fellow-citizens, to bear the burdens of the Government; but we strongly protest against a taxation specific in its character and ruinous in its results to us.

We add the following figures to show how much revenue is now paid by our distillers in Chicago, and what is proposed for them to pay:

There are daily manufactured in the city thirty thousand gallons, which, at twenty cents per gallon, produces a revenue of $6,000, equal to the yearly sum of $1,800,000.

Now if a tax of forty cents per gallon be laid, it will most probably be paid by distillers, and the Government will derive from our city alone the enormous sum of $3,600,000. Are the committee prepared by high excise to prevent this sum from going into the Treasury of the Government?

J. H. WICKER & CO.

SAMUEL M. NICKERSON & CO.

N. H. CROSBY.

THE CHICAGO DISTILLING COMPANY,
Per L. C. ELLSWORTH, Treasurer.

Mr. ARNOLD withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

The amendment offered by Mr. HOLMAN, to strike out "sixty," line ten, and insert "forty," was not agreed to.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I move to insert after the word "on," in line twelve of the first section of the bill, the words "the interest of all parties in default in;" so that it will read:

That from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duty provided for in section forty-one of an act entitled "An act to support the Government, and to pay interest on the public debt," approved July 1, 1862, and in addition to duties payable for licenses, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all spirits that may be distilled and sold, or removed for consumption and sale, of first proof, the duty of sixty cents on each and every gallon; and said duty shall be a lien and charge on such spirits and also on the interest of all parties in default in the distillery used for distilling the same, with all the stills; &c.

My amendment, instead of forfeiting the rights of parties who may not be involved, merely forfeits the rights of those who ought to have paid the tax.

Let me suppose a case for the purpose of illustrating the object of my amendment. Suppose a man has a piece of ground or a building which, without his consent, is used for the purpose of a distillery, and then by collusion between the person who leases it and the public officers there may be a large amount in arrears to the Government for liquors there distilled. By this provision the interest of the innocent owner of the premises is rendered liable for this default. We have become so accustomed to adopt the doctrine of forfeiture within the last year or two, that after a while I think it will be scarcely possible for any person to hold a piece of land and be secure, that at some time or other it will not, by some quibble of law, be forfeited to the Government. I think we should be just in this respect, and that only the rights of the parties in default should be forfeited.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I move to insert in line fifteen, section one, after the word "paid," these words:

And all whisky and all other spirits on being rectified or mixed with any other spirit or fluid whatever, or into which any matter whatever may be infused and to be sold as whisky, brandy, rum, gin, wine, or by any other name, and not otherwise provided for by this act or the act to which it is amendatory, shall pay twenty cents per gallon.

I offer this amendment, Mr. Chairman, because I believe the Committee of Ways and Means have overlooked a very important feature in taxing spirits. I come from a region of country that has been noted for making pure old Bourbon whisky, and especially the county from which I hail. In old times, when we had no railroads, but only turnpikes, upon which to transport our produce, our farmers got into the habit of distilling whisky, and the mode of doing it was in the old-fashioned way, by copper stills. Nearly every farmer who could not dispose of his grain bought one or two copper stills and made his whole crop of grain into whisky; and from the fact that it was made purely from grain, without any foreign ingredients, it acquired a name and reputation all over the country as "Old Bourbon." Still later, since the adaptation of steam and the progress of Yankee ingenuity, we have been enabled to manufacture out of a single bushel of grain twice the quantity that used to be made under the old system. Under the old system two gallons or two gallons and a half was a fair average to be made from a single bushel of grain, but under this other mode of distillation, and by the addition of other and foreign materials, they have been able to make four and five gallons out of a bushel, and men of wealth and men of capital, companies and corporations, have been in the habit of buying up the pure whisky made in the mode I have described, and rectifying it—not purifying it, which is the generally understood meaning of the word "rectifying," but adulterating it, and by this adulteration they make out of one barrel of the pure whisky three or four barrels. Men engaged in this business have made immense fortunes, have become millionaires, and been enabled to build marble palaces. I see no reason why these men should be exempt from taxation, or should only have to pay the duty on one gallon of pure whisky, out of which they make three or four gallons of the adulterated. In this process of adulteration arsenic and strychnine are employed. It has been ascertained by chemical analysis that a single gallon of whisky thus rectified contains poison enough to kill any man in this House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MALLORY. Does my colleague intend by his amendment to decrease the tax imposed by this bill upon whisky of that kind? That seems to be the effect of his amendment, although I do not think he aims at that.

Mr. CLAY. This is intended to be an additional tax. I modify my amendment by adding to it the words "as an additional tax."

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. STILES. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by reducing the tax from sixty cents to fifty cents per gallon. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union has just adopted an amendment imposing an additional tax of twenty cents on rectified spirits. I presume it is well understood that that additional tax is imposed for the benefit of the Bourbon-whisky interest of Kentucky. That interest is not injuriously affected but actually benefited by the imposition of this additional duty, but the interest of distillers generally is injured by it. It is a provision exclusively in favor of the Bourbon-whisky interest. A similar provision was pressed on the last Congress. It was adopted by this House, and was afterwards modified and adopted by the Senate, but finally it was rejected as being legislation in favor of a particular interest, and impracticable as a revenue measure.

I wish to say a word in favor of my proposition to strike out sixty cents and insert fifty cents. I do not propose it because I am in favor of so high a tax. I am satisfied that gentlemen are acting without sufficient regard to the interests of the western section of the country. If we impose on manufactured spirits this duty of sixty cents per gallon, and the additional duty of twenty cents on rectified whisky, my honest conviction is that, instead of the revenue from that source being increased, it is more likely in progress of time to be largely diminished. I do not believe that any gentleman familiar with the subject would be willing to incur the risk of imposing this high duty. I believe it will materially injure the prosperity of the western section. I believe that a duty of thirty cents per gallon would be large enough. I believe that would be a larger increase in comparison than will be put upon other taxable products of the country. But, in any event, it seems to me that the friends of revenue and the friends of the producing interests of the Northwest should firmly protest against this extraordinary discrimination—this tax of sixty cents a gallon on whisky, the average value of which was not more than seventeen cents a gallon prior to this war. I think that that is one of the most remarkable instances of an effort to force a particular interest to bear unreasonable burdens that has ever received the sober consideration of any legislative body. I speak for the West when I say that this tax is unreasonable.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to amend the amendment by imposing a tax of twenty cents per gallon on all pure native rye whisky made in copper stills.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not germane to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, and is not in order.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I propose the following amendment to the amendment:

And provided further, That all stocks of liquor contemplated in this bill, in the hands of any one for consumption, whether in demijohns, bottles, kegs, half barrels, or barrels, shall pay the tax imposed by this bill.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. HOLMAN, and it was rejected.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend by reducing the duty to forty-nine cents. It strikes me that the disposition of certain gentlemen of this House to discriminate against the whisky interest can be accounted for on no other theory than that of the gentleman from Ohio, who remarked the other day that this Government stood on the verge of bankruptcy. I agree with my colleague, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that this is not the time or place to attempt any sumptuary legislation. And I defy gentlemen to show any good reason why the article of whisky should be singled out and taxed to an amount that is treble its value. I hold in my hand a letter from one of my constituents on this subject, which I must confess is better than any speech I can make upon it, or that I have heard made on this floor. I ask the Clerk to read it as part of my remarks.

The letter was read, as follows:

HARRISBURG, January 14, 1864.

MY DEAR SIR: Yesterday's World contains a supplementary law, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, taxing whisky sixty cents from and after the 12th instant. This is the most infamous kind of legislation which can be imagined. It is worse than highway robbery. For although the highway robber springs upon his victim from his lurking-place as unexpectedly as this law was sprung upon the public, yet he only robs the luckless wayfarer of what he has in his pocket; whereas this law robs us of what we had before the promulgation of a proposed law reached us, to wit: we requested the inspector on the 10th instant to call at our distillery to inspect one hundred and fifty barrels of whisky. He came on the 13th and inspected it. We had sold it on the 12th at ninety-five cents, to be delivered at Harrisburg. By this transaction we had expected to make a handsome profit. But the Committee of Ways and Means proposes a retrospective law, which, if carried, not only deprives us of our profit, but exposes us to an actual loss of at least $600. Such a law as this is no better in practice than an ex post facto law.

If this bill passes in its present shape it will break up many honest manufacturers who have carried on their business under the impression that they would be protected by their own Government.

As long as this bill shall be pending what safety will there be in manufacturing, what safety in selling, what safety in buying? The most prudent man will be thrown against his will upon the wild sea of speculation, and see himself exposed to utter ruin through circumstances entirely beyond his control.

If Congress must raise revenue, let them do it prospectively, so that time may be given to all parties concerned to meet the requirements of the law without utter destruction to themselves.

Let the sixty-cent tax take effect from and after the passage of the law, or from the 1st of April, or from any period which will enable the manufacturers to wind up their business with some chance of safety.

I can scarcely believe that Congress will pass this ex post facto law; and yet such is the present state of uncertainty that I see nothing but loss staring me in the face.

Hon. WM. H. MILLER, Washington.

Mr. STEVENS. I move the amendment. If my colleague had moved to make the law prospective then his speech or the letter which he had read would apply to it. I agree most cordially with the general principles contained in that letter. I look upon the legislation to which he has referred as pretty well characterized by that letter. But the bill as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means did not make the tax retrospective. That feature of it comes from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] and I wish my colleague to understand that.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes; and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that when the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall resume the consideration of this bill, all further debate on the first section shall cease in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, all debate on the first section being closed, by order of the House, in one minute.

Mr. HOOPER. By direction of the Committee of Ways and Means I move to amend by striking out the third section, as follows:

Sec. 3. That all distilled spirits on which an excise duty is imposed by law may be exported without payment of said duty, and when the same is intended for exportation may be removed without being charged with duty, if transported directly from the distillery or bonded warehouse, under such rules and regulations and upon execution of such transportation or other bonds as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, said bonds to be taken by the collector of internal revenue of the district in which such distilleries or bonded warehouses may be situated to a bonded warehouse at any port of entry of the United States, said warehouse at the port of entry to be established in accordance with the law and Treasury regulations, and to be used exclusively for the storage of distilled spirits, and to be placed in charge of the proper officers of customs, who, together with the owners and proprietors, shall have the joint custody of all the distilled spirits stored in said warehouses; and all the labor on the goods so stored shall be performed by the owner or proprietor of the warehouse under the supervision of the officer of the customs in charge of the same at the expense of said owner and proprietor, and shall also be subject to the same rates and regulations and be charged with the same costs and expenses in all respects as other goods may be subject to that are deposited in public store for exportation from the United States; and no drawback shall in any case be allowed on any distilled spirits on which an excise duty has been paid, either before or after it has been placed in a bonded warehouse, as aforesaid.

And to insert in lieu thereof as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all distilled spirits upon which an excise duty is imposed by law may be exported without payment of said duty, and when the same is intended for exportation, may, without being charged with duty, be removed under such rules and regulations and upon the execution of such transportation bonds or other security as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, said bonds or other security to be taken by the collector of internal revenue of the district from which such removal is made: Provided, That the said spirits shall be transported directly from the distillery or bonded warehouse to a bonded warehouse established in conformity with the law and Treasury regulations at a port of entry of the United States, and used exclusively for the storage of distilled spirits, and to be placed in charge of a proper officer of the customs, who, together with the owner and proprietor of the warehouse, shall have the joint custody of all the distilled spirits stored in said warehouse; and all the labor on the goods so stored shall be performed by the owner or proprietor of the warehouse, under the supervision of the officer of the customs in charge of the same, and at the expense of the said owner or proprietor; and the said spirits shall also be subject to the same rules and regulations, and be chargeable with the same costs and expenses, in all respects, to which other goods that are deposited in public store for exportation from the United States may be subject; and no drawback shall in any case be allowed on any distilled spirit upon which an excise duty shall have been paid either before or after it shall have been placed in a bonded warehouse as aforesaid; but no provision of this act shall be construed to repeal existing laws which provide that distilled spirits may be removed from the place of manufacture or bonded warehouse for the purpose of being redistilled for exportation, or which provides for the manufacture for exportation of medicines, preparations, compositions, perfumery, and cosmetics.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman from Massachusetts the exact effect of his amendment. Upon hearing it hastily read I infer that his proposition is this: that spirits already distilled and placed in warehouse may be removed for the purpose, for instance, of being manufactured into alcohol, and then may become subject to exportation without the payment of duty. Is that the effect of the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. HOOPER. The amendment submitted by me by direction of the Committee of Ways and Means was not intended to change the character of the original section in its general features, but it was drawn with more care, and covers one or two points which were not provided for directly in the bill as it stands. One point was the right to withdraw from the warehouse for the purpose of distillation and also for the purpose of being manufactured into perfumery and cosmetics. Under the existing law the manufacturer had the right to withdraw his whisky from the bonded warehouse under regulations to be prescribed by the Treasury Department for the purpose of being manufactured into alcohol, and also into cosmetics and perfumery; and the object of this amendment is to accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point I wanted to come at is this. It is a well-known fact that most distillers do not manufacture alcohol. Now I ask whether the whisky may be withdrawn from the bonded warehouse for manufacture into alcohol and then the alcohol be exported without the payment of any duty?

Mr. HOOPER. The object is to give the manufacturer of alcohol as well as the manufacturer of cosmetics and perfumery the right to manufacture for exportation without paying a duty for it.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word.

If I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, it removes a defect which I thought I discovered in the original section for which this is proposed to be substituted. It struck me that while the manufacturer and distiller would be entitled to the benefit of the drawback in case the spirits were exported, the same advantage or benefit would not be given to the exporting merchant. I may have been in error; but I so read the original section. But as I understand the amendment, it clears up the confusion of phraseology and of ideas in the original section, and gives the benefit of the drawback to whoever may export. If I am right in the construction I have placed upon the gentleman's amendment, I am in favor of it. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The amendment offered by Mr. HOOPER was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. With the consent of the committee, I desire to go back to the second section and move to amend the provision which prescribes a penalty by inserting "one half of which shall be awarded, and, upon recovery, paid, to the informer."

I will simply say that I have consulted a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means, and that no dissent has been expressed to the amendment.

No objection being made, the amendment was received and adopted.

Mr. KASSON. I move the same amendment to section —, to add at the end of the section, "one half to be awarded, and upon recovery to be paid, to the informer."

Mr. STEVENS. I will suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that an amendment be offered to apply to all the penalties provided in the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I have no objection to that; and, with the understanding that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, will offer such an amendment, I will withdraw the one I have offered.

Mr. BLAINE. I move the following amendment:

Provided, That upon the cotton on which a duty of one half cent has been paid, an additional duty of one and a half cents shall be levied and collected.

It corresponds with the previous action of the committee. It is to make the tax uniform.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ENGLISH moved that the committee rise. The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes; and had come to no conclusion thereon.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENS moved that it be made the special order for day after to-morrow, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. Say Tuesday next. The bill has not been printed, and it is one that ought to be carefully considered.

Mr. STEVENS. I agree to Monday, after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF CADETS.

Mr. NELSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill increasing the pay of cadets at West Point; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DAKOTA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, presented papers in the Dakota contested-election case; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

REBELLIOUS STATES.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask unanimous consent of the House to make a report from the select committee on the rebellious States. The chairman [Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland] is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that objection will not be made if a day late in February is fixed for its consideration.

Mr. PENDLETON. I object. It must come in regularly.

Mr. COX moved that the House do now adjourn.

And then (at five minutes past four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Mr. COLLAMER, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a petition of mail route agents, praying for an increase of their compensation, and a petition of mail route agents, praying that all letters delivered to them for mailing shall be prepaid by stamps at double rates, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 143) to amend the law prescribing

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 22, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 19

ing the articles to be admitted into the mails of the United States, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and to recommend its passage. I ask that it be put on its passage now.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to allow articles of clothing, manufactured of wool, cotton, or linen, and comprised in a package not exceeding two pounds in weight, addressed to any non-commissioned officer or private serving in the armies of the United States, to be transmitted in the mails at the rate of eight cents, to be in all cases prepaid, for every four ounces, or any fraction thereof, subject to such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 41.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill consists of seven sections. The first section provides that enlistments hereafter made in the regular Army during the continuance of the present rebellion shall be for the term of three years. The second section provides that all persons of African descent who have been or may be mustered into the military service of the United States shall receive the same uniform, clothing, arms, equipments, camp equipage, rations, medical and hospital attendance, pay and emoluments, as other soldiers of the regular or volunteer forces of the like arm of the service, and that every such person hereafter mustered into service shall receive two months' pay in advance. The third section declares that when any man or boy of African descent owing service or labor in any State under its laws shall be mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, he, and his mother, wife, and children, shall be forever free. The fourth section proposes to allow full pay, without rations, to chaplains heretofore or hereafter absent by reason of wounds or sickness; half pay with rations during absence on leave occasioned by other causes. The fifth section proposes to allow to the battalion of engineers one adjutant, one quartermaster, and one commissary of subsistence, to be selected from the lieutenants on duty with the battalion, with the same compensation as regimental adjutants and quartermasters respectively. The sixth section proposes to add to the battalion of engineers one sergeant major, one quartermaster sergeant, and one commissary sergeant, with the pay of a sergeant of engineers. The seventh section provides that the officer in command of that battalion shall be allowed the pay and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel of engineers.

The bill had been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and reported with amendments. The first amendment was in the second section, after the word "emoluments," in the fifth line, to insert the words "other than bounty," so as not to allow bounty to troops of African descent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, to strike out in lines one and two the words "man or boy" and to insert "person," and after the word "descent" in line two to strike out the word "owing" and insert the word "whose," and after "labor" in line three to insert "is claimed," so as to make the section read:

"That when any person of African descent whose service or labor is claimed in any State under the laws thereof shall be mustered;" &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section six, to strike out in line three the words "and one" and to insert "who shall also be," and in line four before the word "each" to insert the word "and,"

and to strike out the word "with" and insert "shall have;" so as to make the section read:

That there be added to the battalion of engineers one sergeant major, one quartermaster sergeant who shall also be commissary sergeant; and each shall have the pay of a sergeant of engineers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to move an amendment to the fourth section of the bill. In the second and sixth lines of that section after the word "sickness" I move to insert the words "or captured;" so that chaplains when absent from duty by reason of wounds or sickness, or captured, shall be allowed full pay without rations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether under this bill any bounty is to be given to colored soldiers.

Mr. WILSON. No bounty is given under this bill to colored soldiers. The committee considered that subject, and decided that it was not necessary. The information we had was that it was not necessary to give a bounty. By existing law, soldiers are entitled to one month's pay in advance. We have provided, however, that colored soldiers shall receive two months' pay in advance instead of giving them a bounty. It was thought that that was all that was necessary, certainly in regard to colored soldiers raised in the rebel States.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems that matters in regard to military affairs are left pretty much to the discretion of the Military Committee, and I suppose it will be useless for me to attempt to change the bill as it is now presented to us by that committee. If I had my way, I should give a bounty of $100 to all these colored men. The chairman of the committee should remember, in the first place, that colored men are not alone enlisted in the rebel States, but they are enlisted in the loyal States, and they ought to have a bounty to induce them to enlist. I warn Senators of this: that in a little while we shall have an application here from several of those States to be permitted to go down into the rebel States and enlist men to be applied to their quotas; and the argument will be, "You do not succeed in enlisting any of them for the Government; we are willing to go into the rebel States and pay a liberal bounty, and in that way we can induce these men to go into our ranks and fight for us." The Government is not able to enlist them because you do not allow them to give a bounty. You deny to the Federal Government that privilege; and yet you will be asked to allow other States in the Union to go down into those States and induce these men to enlist by giving them most munificent bounties. That will be the upshot of this business.

Mr. ANTHONY. This bill does not prohibit bounties.

Mr. GRIMES. As I understand the chairman of the committee the bill does not allow the Government to give bounties to the colored soldiers raised under it.

Mr. WILSON. It does not.

Mr. ANTHONY. It does not authorize, but it does not prohibit it.

Mr. GRIMES. The Government cannot give them without some authority or authorization.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Military Committee, in reference to these colored soldiers having two months' pay in advance, whether there is also a law allowing the claimant who claims this service or labor to have any compensation? I understand the Department are preparing papers to authorize their agents to pay some three or four hundred dollars to the persons who claim these slaves, as a consideration of their losing their service and labor if they go into the service of the United States. I desire to inquire whether there is any law for that; whether, when the Government takes the slave of a man, no matter if he is in rebellion or not, and he is made a soldier in the Army, his master gets anything for it?

Mr. WILSON. There is no law for it now that I know of, other than the authority that was given to the War Department to use the commutation money to obtain substitutes. I suppose that under that general authority, wherever they enlisted persons who were claimed to owe service, they have made some recognition of the claim of the master. I know of no other law than that. I do not know the extent to which the Department has gone in that respect. I take it, to a very limited one.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not understand that anything has been paid up to this time to any master as a consideration for losing the services of his slave. I only understand that they are in the process of being paid; that arrangements are being made to compensate the owner. It occurred to me that that should not be done without a law authorizing it at any rate; and I, for one, am opposed to having a law for it. But as the matter hangs in suspense and doubt, and as some think they have law for it and some think they have not, I suggest to the chairman of the Military Committee to fix it in the law, and fix it here and now. This is the time and this is the place to settle that question; and let us know and have the Senate decide the question whether they are to be compensated or not.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. CLARK. What for?

Mr. GRIMES. I want to amend it and to look into it. I had no idea of it coming up to-day. We had an understanding that the special order was to come up immediately after the morning business. I make the motion to postpone.

Mr. POWELL. If it is in order, I move to strike out the third section of this bill. If the Senator from Iowa wishes to move to postpone the bill, I will waive my motion, and will make it to-morrow when the bill shall come up. However, I will make the motion now, and it can be entered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to postpone takes precedence of the motion to amend. The Senator from Iowa moves to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow. The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 143) to amend the law prescribing the articles to be admitted into the mails of the United States; and it received the signature of the Vice President.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A resolution submitted by the Senator from Kentucky is now in order, calling for correspondence between the authorities of the United States and the rebels in reference to the exchange of prisoners. It comes up regularly in order in the morning hour.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope a vote will be taken on that resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the Senate with a copy of all the correspondence between the authorities of the United States and the rebel authorities on the exchange of prisoners, and the different propositions connected with that subject.

Mr. WILSON. I think that had better lie over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the resolution will not lie over, but that we shall take it up and pass it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think if the resolution is to pass it ought to be amended, and directed to the President of the United States if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, in the usual form. I move that amendment, to insert "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. DAVIS. I think the addition suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island very superfluous. Of course the whole correspondence is in the possession of the rebel authorities. They have received all the correspondence that has been directed to them or any of their agents on the part of the Government of the United States, and of course they have retained copies of their own correspondence. The only parties to this matter are the rebels and the Government of the United States. How is it possible that it can be necessary to withhold any of this correspondence to subvert the public interests? The rebel government have it; our Government have it. The only other parties to the affair are the people of the United States, and it seems to me that the people of the United States, the sovereigns in theory at least of this country, have a right to demand that that correspondence be thrown before them. I think, sir, that the resolution ought to pass without any exception or any reservation. If it was a matter of correspondence between our Government and a foreign Government, I concede that the gentleman's suggestion would be eminently proper and indeed imperative; but between the rebels who are in possession of the whole correspondence and our Government—this affair being limited to these two parties—it seems to me that the usual qualification of such a resolution is altogether unnecessary.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the resolution is directed to the President—I was not aware of it—it seems to me these words should go in as a matter of course. I think it is hardly respectful to pass a resolution without that qualification. I think it is always the case that this limitation is inserted in such resolutions.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the Senate is hardly prepared to act finally on this resolution. I would therefore move to postpone that and all prior orders in order to proceed with the order of the day. The Senator from Delaware is in his seat, who, I understand, proposes to address the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to postpone this subject and all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The motion was agreed to.

OATH OF OFFICE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution of Mr. SUMNER:

Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the Senate:

The oath or affirmation prescribed by act of Congress of July 2, 1862, to be taken and subscribed before entering upon the duties of office, shall be taken and subscribed by every Senator in open Senate before entering upon his duties. It shall also be taken and subscribed in the same way by the Secretary of the Senate; but the other officers of the Senate may take and subscribe it in the office of the Secretary.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SAULSBURY, to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert the following:

That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether Senators and Representatives in Congress are included within the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, and whether the said act is in accordance or in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the resolution upon your table, as I understand it, offers for the consideration of the Senate three questions. The first is, whether the act of July 2, 1862, requiring an oath to be taken by certain officers of the Government, includes Senators. The second is, if it does include Senators, whether to that extent it is constitutional. The third is, whether, if it has not operation by its own force but is to become operative only by the Senate's adopting the rule which forms the subject of the resolution upon your table, it is expedient to adopt it. I propose, as briefly as I may consistent with perspicuity, to examine each of those questions in the order in which I have stated them; and in doing so, Mr. President, it is very far from my purpose to explain away the meaning of the statute; and according to my view of the duty of a Senator such a purpose would be anything but its faithful discharge, even if I possessed any superfluity of learning, to which the honorable member from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] referred, and I was capable by means of such superfluity of carrying away the plain meaning of terms, or if I possessed that acuteness of criticism to which he also adverted, I should be incapable of using it for the purpose of explaining away the clear meaning of the language to be found in any statute.

As I understand the relation in which we are toward the country, it is much higher than that which belongs to the mere forensic officer who is often called upon to defend the wrong and to defeat the right, to protect the guilty as well as to shield the innocent; and he but faithfully discharges that duty if he does not resort to all proper and admissible modes of argument which may lead to the successful result of his effort. But that is not the function of a Senator, and it is especially not his function when called upon to vote on such a proposition as the one now pending. His function is quasi judicial, and he is to bring to the consideration of every question which may be before the Senate all the coolness and all the frankness and all the maturity which should ever characterize the judicial office. I wish it, therefore, to be understood by the honorable member from Rhode Island, as well as by others, that in what I am about to say upon the subject before the Senate I speak under the sense of the same responsibility that I should have if I was administering justice in the highest court of the land. I shall speak only of my own opinions, and endeavor only to maintain them by such arguments as I believe are well founded.

Before I proceed, Mr. President, with this explanation, to discuss the particular questions which I am about to debate, there are some general considerations which in my view belong to the subject. The Government which we are here to administer has all its powers, whatever they may be, from the Constitution. It had no anterior existence. It came into life with that instrument, and it came into life with only such functions as that instrument conferred upon it. The rule of interpretation when we are called upon to interpret the Constitution of the United States as regards its powers is not the rule which governs in the interpretation of State constitutions. From the beginning of the Government to the present hour in every department of it, legislative, executive, and judicial, and in every department, legislative, executive, and judicial of the several State constitutions, the principle has been recognized as a principle not only not necessary to be proved but proving itself, that in order to ascertain whether a particular power exists in the Government of the United States in either of its departments you are to look to the Constitution for the purpose of ascertaining whether it is there delegated. When you are called upon to interpret a State constitution in relation to the same inquiry, the rule is that you are to look into the State constitution for the purpose of ascertaining whether it is there prohibited. If, in the latter case, the subject itself be one of a judicial character, one of an executive character, or one of a legislative character—and the constitution divides the departments into executive, judicial, and legislative—all powers properly executive, properly judicial, and properly legislative are vested in those several departments unless there is to be found in the constitution of the particular State some restriction.

The difference, then, between the mode of interpreting the powers of the two Governments is that, in relation to the last, all powers exist unless they are prohibited; in relation to the first, that no power exists unless it be delegated; or, to state it in different words, that the absence of a delegation of the power in the Constitution of the United States is restrictive of the power, just as effectually as is the existence of a restriction in a State constitution restrictive of the particular power. When Senators, therefore, are called upon to decide whether any particular subject is within the sphere of the legislative department of the United States, it is incumbent on those who allege that it is to show that it is to be found in some one of the powers delegated to that department of the Government of the United States. I do not mean that they are obliged to show that it is there by words of express delegation; but they are bound to show that it is there by delegation, express or implied. Failing in that, they fail in establishing the existence of the power.

With these remarks, Mr. President, I proceed to call the attention of the Senate, as far as it will suit them to give it to me, to the consideration of the questions which I have stated in their order. First, then, what is the meaning of the act of July, 1862, as far as it affects this question? Does it or does it not embrace a Senator? I think not. When I had the honor of appearing in this body in March last, I stated briefly—the occasion did not warrant, as I thought, anything but a brief statement—why it was that I supposed the act did not embrace the case of a Senator, and why it was that I supposed if it did it was without authority. But, because of the character of the act and the particular condition of the country, and from an unwillingness to have it even conjectured on any ground, however feeble, that I was not as loyal as he must be who takes that oath, I took it and I would take it again as long as the Senate shall not have decided that there is no power to enforce it.

But the question is now before us, does that act embrace the case of a Senator? Now, if there be any principle established as a principle of sound constitutional law, without which the Government cannot progress satisfactorily, beneficially, it is that these questions when they arise, or any questions of constitutional law when they have arisen and have been decided, and the decision has been acquiesced in by every department of the Government, are to be considered as finally decided. I do not mean, Mr. President, that it is upon the ground that such a decision has the authority of a judicial judgment, binding as authority upon all succeeding judicial functionaries; but I mean to say that the law of expediency, the law of propriety, the law of safety, looking to the wholesome administration of the Government, demands that when questions of that sort have been so decided and for years acquiesced in they should be considered as settled. It was upon that ground, as we all know, that Mr. Madison signed the act to incorporate the Bank of the United States in 1816. He had been opposed to the original bank, and had maintained his opinions as to the unconstitutionality of the original bank with the rare ability which characterized everything that ever fell from his lips or his pen; and yet he yielded his own individual opinion to the sentiment of the country as that sentiment was declared through the judicial and executive and legislative departments of the Government as the popular will.

Has, then, the principle involved in the first of these inquiries been settled? I speak in the presence of Senators for whose opinions I have a most unaffected respect. The learned gentleman who spoke yesterday—who, even with those who have never heard him but once, and who have no familiarity with him, and no knowledge of him except what might be derived from hearing him once, is an authority of a high order—entertains an opinion adverse to my own; and I approach, therefore, the effort to make good my own opinion with all the deference which belongs to the high character and the ability of the honorable member to whom I allude, [Mr. COLLAMER]. I have known him not here for the first time. I have known him in the councils of the nation before; I have seen him at the council board; I have heard over and over again words of wisdom fall from his lips; and I have always come to the conclusion that a gentleman of fairer intellect and of more spotless integrity never adorned the councils of the nation. But I am here not to pin my faith upon mere authority, bound to act upon the teachings of my own judgment after I have, by every effort in my power, endeavored to inform it as well as I was capable.

I understood the honorable member to whom I refer as saying yesterday, in the conclusion of his speech, characterized by his accustomed power, little or nothing upon the first of the questions with which I am now dealing. He seemed to consider that the question had not been settled, but he appeared to be satisfied that he proved that fact when he stated it. To that mode of proof I never could yield. Has it, then, been settled? In the case of Blount (I shall not occupy the time of the Senate by taking up the book) the very question was presented, is a Senator of the United States an officer within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution of the United States which provides for the impeachment of officers? and the Senate, by a vote of 14 to 11, after an argument of great power, pro and con., by the managers upon the part of the House of Representatives, Messrs. Bayard and Harper, and by the counsel for the accused, decided that he was not; and from that day to this there has not only been expressed no opinion to the contrary entitled to be considered as authority, but, as far as any opinion has been expressed, it has been in accordance with that precedent.

In the case of Smith, whom it was proposed to expel from the Senate upon the ground that he had been a party to the treason in which Aaron Burr was concerned, the report of the committee, which concluded with a resolution that it was good cause for expulsion—a report drawn by Mr. Adams with the power which always distinguished him; anxious, too, as he was, as is apparent from the report itself, to bring about the expulsion of the Senator—yet admits, if I understand it, that the power of impeachment did not exist. Mr. Adams labored to show, therefore, that the only way in which the Senator could be gotten rid of was by exercising the power to expel conferred by a different clause in the Constitution, and that to do that two thirds were necessary; and because two thirds were necessary, the proposition contained in the resolution reported by him failed. But in that report, after speaking of the great necessity that there was and will be during all time to rid the Senate of a man who has committed a crime such as was imputed to Smith, and such as he believed to have been satisfactorily proved, and such as a majority of the Senate believed to have been satisfactorily proved, he maintains the right to effect that object by expulsion, because, as he says:

“In the midst of all this anxious providence of legislative virtue it has not authorized the constituent body to recall in any case its representative. It has not subjected him to removal by impeachment.”

And in the Commentaries of Mr. Justice Story, to be found in the second volume from section seven hundred and eighty-nine to seven hundred and ninety-three inclusive—I cite the sections because all the editions correspond as to the sections—he admits almost in terms that a Senator or Representative is not within the impeaching clause of the Constitution, and he gives his reasons; and he not only is of opinion that he is excluded from that clause, but that he was properly excluded upon principles of policy which, in his judgment, were sound; that the independence of the Senate and of the House, the necessity of placing them in a condition in which they could not be affected by the action of any dominant majority required that they should be held responsible alone to their immediate constituents, the people in the one case, and the people represented by the Legislatures in the other, or to the mere power of the Senate or of the House to expel. He goes on to say that from the decision in Blount's case up to the time when he was penning these Commentaries it seems to be the received construction of that clause in the Constitution that it excludes, because it does not include, Senators and Representatives; and I say with him that it is well that it is so, as I think. In times of high party excitement, when the passions are uppermost and the reason subdued, acts of political outrage are often perpetrated pregnant with obvious mischief to the country; and it is especially proper as illustrated by the condition in which we find ourselves.

Perhaps there are no two Senators on this floor who concur upon all the questions of the day; there are no two Senators upon this floor who concur in the proper construction to be given to the most important clauses of the instrument. There are some Senators on the floor who would refuse to exert their duty as citizens, provided the Constitution shall be imperative in relation to one of the clauses of that instrument. I forbear to designate Senators. Now, what would have been said, when the Senate consisted of gentlemen wholly unlike in one respect to a large majority of the present body, if not to the whole, if, in relation to the slavery question and the various questions which grew out of the discussion of the slavery question, in which some of the Senators on this floor expressed opinions which, as they thought, were not loyal to the Government, a resolution had been offered to require them in the future not only to swear that they would pursue a different course hereafter, but that they never had pursued such a course in the past? Would not every gentleman have said that that would have been an outrage on the freedom of debate, an outrage on the conscientious discharge of duty by a Senator? A Senator, like every individual in the land, has a right to his own political opinion, subject only to the laws, civil or criminal. If the expression of any opinion does wrong to the individual right of a citizen, the courts are open for redress. If it be made criminal by any criminal statute which the United States has an authority to pass, he may be punished; but in no other way. For what we say in debate here it was the purpose of the Constitution to provide that we shall be responsible nowhere. What an idle provision it would have been if, while denying the existence of any responsibility, for words spoken or opinions expressed here, outside of the Senate, we were responsible to the Senate and could be expelled from the Senate, not because of any act, not because of any moral crime, but merely because of the expression of an opinion upon a constitutional question which the Senator who may have expressed it conscientiously entertained.

But further, to proceed with the question, let us consider it as now for the first time before the Senate. Is a Senator a civil officer? The language of the statute in that respect is precisely the same as is the language of the clause providing for impeachments in the Constitution itself. What “civil officer” means in the one, the same term means in the other. Let me call the attention of Senators, not at length, but very briefly, to such clauses as I suppose bear upon the particular question. The question for us to decide is, is a Senator or a Representative in the other House the occupant of a civil office, or a civil officer within the meaning of the Constitution? I say he is not. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] says, but did not attempt to prove it as far as I heard, that he is. The sixth section of the first article of the Constitution contains this provision:

“No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States.”

Now, stopping there, as we see, the words “Senator or Representative,” or the Senator or the Representative, is spoken of in contradistinction to every other office. If it had been in the view of the Convention to place, with reference to this clause, Senators and Representatives upon the same footing with all others, and according to their view they were civil officers, then all that would have been necessary would be to say that no one during the time for which he holds his office shall be appointed to any other office. Such is not the language. The prohibition is upon the Senator or Representative in that character, not as an officer, not as holding a civil office, but in his character of Senator or Representative as contradistinguished from a civil office, according to the terms of the Constitution; and it therefore provides, as they were obliged to provide, if their meaning was, as I suppose it to have been, that he should not be appointed to any civil office.

But the conclusion of the paragraph makes it, as I think, still more obvious:

“And no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.”

Now, what is the meaning of the term “holding any office” as here used? Is it that the word “office” was used for the purpose of including a Senator or Representative? Then the provision would have been absurd, because as Senator or Representative he is then holding an office. Was it the purpose to say that he should not hold any other office? If it had been, and they considered a Senator or Representative as the incumbent of an office, then the provision would have been that he should not hold any other office under the United States. But the provision being that he shall not hold any office under the United States, as I think conclusively demonstrates that, in the view of the Convention, the term “office” was not designed to include a Senator or Representative; and for the same reason the term “Senator or Representative” was not intended to include the same thing as the term “office;” in other words, that in the judgment of the Convention the two were entirely separate.

But that is not the only clause. The eighth clause of the ninth section of the first article provides:

“And no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present,” &c.

Drawing a distinction, as I think, evidently between the Congress of the United States; the Senators and Representatives who constitute the Congress of the United States, and those who hold offices under the appointing power which the Government contains.

But again, sir, the second paragraph in the first section of the second article contains a clause which is pregnant with instruction upon this question:

“Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.”

Here, as in the former instance, the distinction is kept up, and the term “Senator or Representative” is used not as equivalent to, or identical with, the term “person holding an office,” but as standing in a different relation to the Government, and Senators and Representatives are included in the disqualification—no ingenuity can suggest a different reason—because, in the opinion of the Convention, if they had not been specially mentioned they might have been electors.

So, again, in the second section of the same article, it contains provisions for the appointment of officers under the United States. It says that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint “ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States.”

The third section provides that all officers of the United States are to be commissioned by him. The language of the concluding part of that section being—

“He [the President] shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States.”

Now, Mr. President, when we come to the immediate succeeding section, which gives the power to impeach, we find the language to be—

“The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment.”

Why were the President and Vice President included in this impeaching clause? What was the necessity for it? If it be true that they were civil officers, why would it not have been sufficient to say, “All civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment?” Can any other reason be given than that which I have suggested in relation to the other clauses; that it was because the Convention did not esteem the President and Vice President civil officers; but intended by the term “civil officers,” as here found, to exclude all who are not appointed officers under the Constitution; and because the President of the United States is elected by the people, and the Vice President is elected by the people, and it was desirable, upon grounds of public policy, to subject them to the impeaching powers of Congress, they are inserted; but the insertio unius est exclusio alterius is a familiar rule of interpretation. Their insertion demonstrates that in the intention of the Convention they were not civil officers, and the omission to insert Senators and Representatives in the same clause demonstrates that it was not the purpose of the Convention to subject Senators or Representatives to the same clause; and we can very readily, as I think, see the reasons for the distinction.

How do we get here? By any appointment under the Government of the United States? Certainly not. We owe our appointment to our respective State Legislatures by the very terms of the Constitution, and we could not derive it from any other quarter. How do the Representatives get into the opposite Chamber? By the election of the people, and in no other way. They are therefore a part of the Government, to administer the Government, holding their offices paramount to the Government, by a title superior to anything to be found in the Constitution which creates the Government, and they are intended to be responsible only to the appointing power—the Legislatures in the first case, the constituents of Senators; and the people in the other case, the constituents of the members.

What is the Senate of the United States? Is each member of the Senate the Senate? Certainly not. In what, then, does the Senate consist? What is it? It is a body of men; (and so of the House;) numerous because obliged to be numerous, but constituting but one body—a Senate—deriving their powers not under but by the Constitution; holding them not subject to any other power except the restraints to be found in the Constitution; bound to yield obedience to no other department of the Government, except so far as they are made immediately amenable by constitutional provision. Has the President of the United States any authority to call in question the conduct of the Senate? Certainly not. Have the House of Representatives any authority to call it in question? Certainly not. Why? Because we constitute a coördinate department of the Government, existing by virtue of a higher power or as high a power as that which brings into existence the President or the House of Representatives, and entitled to stand exempt from all right of challenge.

A different doctrine in the present condition of the country I think would be fruitful of mischief. There are questions upon which we differ diametrically. The honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] entertains an opinion upon one of them which I think is not only unconstitutional, but most mischievous. He entertains it conscientiously, I have no doubt. He has attempted to maintain it with learning and ability; but, in my judgment, it is not only a constitutional heresy, but a most mischievous constitutional heresy. He does not think so, I am sure; because if he did he would not entertain it, or if he did entertain it, he would not express it; but, in my judgment, it is calculated to lead to most disastrous results in the present exigency of the country, and is certain to delay, if not forever to defeat, the restoration of the Union. It is that the existence of the civil war which is now covering the land with blood in one section and carrying agony in another, has dissolved perpetually the ties which bound us of the loyal States to the States in rebellion; that they are so totally destroyed that the States in rebellion are now to be considered as out of the Union as States, territorially subject to the unlimited will of Congress, and to come back only at such time and upon such terms as the Congress of the United States in its wisdom may provide; and it has been said that that opinion has for its authority not only that of reason as applied to the Constitution itself, but a solemn decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. An officer of the Government, of research and of great critical acumen, published a letter not long since, semi-officially, in which he announced that the decision of the Supreme Court in what are called the prize causes, maintained that doctrine by establishing a principle which necessarily led to its support. The learned editor of Wheaton's Law of Nations saw proper, in a recent letter which he addressed to a law magazine in London, to state the same thing; because, as he understood, the Supreme Court in those cases had decided that war existed between the loyal and the disloyal States, and that the citizens of the disloyal States were just as much enemies as they would have been if they had been independent States and the war was a national one.

This is an entire misapprehension of the decision of the court. On this subject I think I speak knowingly. The whole question before that tribunal in those cases was, as far as this particular proposition is concerned, whether the law of prize could be made to apply to property captured upon the ocean which had come from the territorial limits of one of the seceded States. The Supreme Court decided, and the reasoning demonstrates that it was not their purpose to hold the doctrine for which the decision has been quoted, that the law of prize applied to property so captured, not upon the ground that any ordinance of secession was operative; not upon the ground that the States who may have passed any such ordinance of secession were out of the Union; not upon the ground that by any other act other than the ordinance of secession they had taken themselves out of the Union, but upon the ground that the property was liable to capture because, in the sense of the prize law, it is to be considered as enemy's property, and that it was no defense to say on the part of the owner that he was also a traitor as well as the owner of the property. Traitor! Traitor to what? What Government? Not a traitor to the seceded States. How a traitor? Why a traitor, and why continuously a traitor as long as he has aided the rebellion? Because he owed allegiance to the United States, was a member of the great Republic; and his practical allegiance, whether it was voluntary or enforced, to the government of the State of which he was a resident, or the government of the confederate States of which his State was a part, had no operation at all to discharge him from his allegiance to the United States; but that for all time, until separation shall, with the consent of the United States, be accomplished—a time I trust never to come—that for all time, as long as the United States shall exist, he who is found within the territorial limits of these seceded States waging war against the United States, or giving aid and comfort to the enemy, is a traitor to the United States, and if captured may be tried and executed. That is quite a different question. He who commits treason against the United States at any time, whether at the present time and under the circumstances in which the country now is, or in more peaceful times, is liable to be punished. That is all true enough; but the very fact that he is liable to be punished proves that he is still a citizen of the United States, who have the right to punish him, as without his being such a citizen the right of punishment could not exist.

I have said now, Mr. President, as much as I propose to say on the first of these questions. Next as to the second. I do not know why the Senator from Massachusetts thinks it is necessary to incorporate the provisions of this law in the form of a rule. If he supposes that the law would have no operation until it becomes a rule of the Senate, the proposition which he presents is more liable to objection than the one which I am about to argue; for, however true it may be that Congress in its legislative capacity may impose an oath other than that which the Constitution proposes to Senators of the United States, I suppose no one will contend, except the Senator from Massachusetts—if he holds that opinion, and I do not know that he does—that it is in the power of the Senate by any such rule to require any such additional oath. If it is not, then your proposed rule is altogether unnecessary. If the law does not operate by its own terms it cannot operate at all. If, as the Presiding Officer of this body, it is not your duty, sir, to administer this oath because of the law, as it is to administer the oath prescribed by the Constitution, you cannot get the authority to administer it by the mere adoption of a resolution. That is a question which I do not propose to discuss now. I mention it only in order to say that the rule is wholly unnecessary provided the law be operative; and if the law be not operative the rule is entirely without authority.

I do not see in his seat the Senator who spoke yesterday, [Mr. COLLAMER.] His absence I regret. If I understood him—and I the more especially regret his absence, because I may not have understood him—he puts the validity of the law of July 2, 1862, entirely upon the ground that it was necessary to carry out the antecedent legislation of Congress, and he referred you to another act of July, 1862, which provided for the punishment of treason in different modes, and for the confiscation of the property of persons convicted; and I understood him to say, in substance, that, without the existence of such legislation, or of equivalent legislation, the affidavit act, the oath act would be without authority. Now, when an honorable Senator places a proposition of that sort upon that ground, he ought to be perfectly certain of his facts. The act which is incorporated in this resolution was passed on the 2d of July. The treason act to which the Senator adverted was passed on the 17th of July. The validity, therefore, of this act is to be tested by the right of Congress to pass it when it was passed. It cannot be pretended that a law invalid at the time it was passed becomes valid by subsequent legislation, where that legislation has no reference at all to the antecedent law, does not revive it, does not apply it, says nothing in relation to it, but contents itself with punishing treason in the person and in the property of the traitor in the way that it thinks proper. Then, in point of fact, the whole foundation of his argument fails, even supposing the legislation to which he adverted was contemporaneous with or antecedent to the passage of the act of the 2d of July.

But the existence of such legislation is necessary, in the view of the honorable member, in order to give to Congress the authority to pass this act which is proposed to be incorporated in our rules; and why? Why, said the honorable member, these gladiatorial exhibitors of treason on the floor of the Senate may come back. Well, suppose they can? Does that of itself show that you have any power to keep them out? And upon what does he place the power to keep them out? Upon the ground that they have committed treason. Treason is made an offense of a peculiar character with reference to its punishment, by the act which he supposed to have been passed either before or at the same time with the act of July 2, 1862. Well, what is treason, and how is it to be tried? He told you, he told you correctly, that the Constitution says that treason can only be tried where the acts of treason are committed. You are therefore to go to South Carolina or to Mississippi, and you are to try Jefferson Davis or any other of those assumed dignitaries there, and to convict them there. Then he told the Senate, and I suppose with a great deal of truth, you cannot convict them there, and that leads him to a conclusion in my judgment entirely unwarranted by the Constitution. Because you cannot under the Constitution convict, you are to convict without it; because you cannot punish constitutionally, you are to punish unconstitutionally! Can any proposition be more pregnant with mischief? If the Constitution is annulled or suspended in the seceded States, so as to leave to the Government of the United States the authority to do what it could not do under the Constitution but for its suspension or annulment, the proposition of the Senator would be right; but he does not carry it to that extent. He admits, and properly admits, that a conviction of either of the offenses mentioned in the act of the 17th of July cannot be had, because a trial cannot be had such as the Constitution only contemplates; and we have no remedy left to us, as he supposes, but to let these gentlemen come back and indulge again in their treasonable gladiatorial exhibitions.

Besides stating that ground, which in my judgment is wholly untenable, and which he rested exclusively upon the meaning of what he called the treason act, the honorable member said that by that act the framers of it, and Congress in adopting it, studiously guarded against the necessity of a conviction, as far as the particular question is concerned. That is an entire misapprehension of the meaning of the act. In the first place, the act deals with the future, and with the future alone. It does not lay its hands at all upon any antecedent treason. It provides exclusively for the punishment of subsequent acts of treason; and how are they to be punished? Punished because any tribunal that may get possession of the party charged is satisfied in its own mind that he has been guilty of the act with which he has been charged? No, sir; he is to be tried and convicted. How tried, how convicted? Only under the limitations provided by the Constitution of the United States; tried where the offense is committed; tried by a jury of the vicinage sitting under the superintendence of a court of the United States. The language of the first section—and all the sections are in that respect the same—is

"That every person who shall hereafter commit the crime of treason against the United States, and shall be adjudged guilty thereof, shall suffer death; and all his slaves, if any, shall be declared and made free."

The second section is that every person who shall hereafter incite, set on foot, &c., rebellion or insurrection against the United States, "and be convicted thereof," shall be punished. And then the third section, upon which the honorable member relied, is in these words:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That every person guilty of either of the offenses described in this act shall be forever incapable and disqualified to hold any office under the United States."

This is an instance of that acuteness of criticism to which the honorable member from Rhode Island adverted yesterday; not the superfluity of learning, but the acuteness of criticism. "That every person guilty" of what? Guilty of treason in the judgment of the Senate, or the House of Representatives, or the President? Guilty of treason of what kind? What was the treason which they had in their minds when they drafted this third section? It is the treason defined and provided for in the two antecedent sections; and the only construction therefore to be put upon the third section is that every person found guilty, as the first and second sections provide, of the offenses contained in those sections, shall, as a part of the punishment, be forever thereafter disqualified from holding an office; and, I speak it in the hearing of lawyers who I am sure will agree with me in that particular, under that provision he who is tried and convicted for the offense specified in the first and the second sections of the act would be adjudged, as a part of the punishment, to be at any time thereafter disqualified to hold any office under the United States.

But, Mr. President, supposing, for the sake of the argument, that I am wrong and that the honorable member is right in this particular, does that justify this resolution? The resolution provides that the act of July 2, 1862, shall become one of the rules of the Senate; and that act says, as gentlemen understand it, that every Senator shall swear first that he has never voluntarily borne arms against the United States; second, that he has never voluntarily given aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States; third, that he has never sought or exercised, or attempted to exercise, the functions of any office under any authority hostile to the United States; and fourth, that he has never yielded voluntary support to any pretended government hostile to the United States. That is, he is to swear that he has never done any of these things at any time in the past. The language of the treason act, as you have seen, deals altogether with the future; and the honorable member from Vermont places the authority of Congress to pass this law upon the ground that the acts which the party is called upon to swear that he has not done are made criminal by a statute passed at the same time, according to his recollection of it; and that, being criminal by such legislation, it was in the power of Congress to make a man swear that he had not committed them. If the proposition is a sound one at all, the answer is that the statute which creates the offense does not make either of the four acts or species of conduct included within the oath-law an offense; so that, so far as those four provisions are concerned, the validity of that act stands exclusively upon the Constitution of the United States, irrespective of any contemporary legislation.

But, Mr. President, suppose the act of the 17th of July had said that it should be a part of the punishment of a man who was convicted of treason against the United States that he should be disqualified from holding any office under the United States, would anybody deny that that would be invalid because of the prohibition of the Constitution against the passage of any ex post facto law? These terms have been construed over and over again. They not only prohibit legislation making that an offense which was no offense before, but legislation adding to the punishment which alone was visited upon an existing offense; and it would therefore necessarily follow that the effect of the 17th of July, 1862, had provided that those who had, before the passage of that act, committed treason should not only be subjected to the punishment provided by the law as it stood at the time the treason was committed, but should also be forever disqualified to hold any office, it would, to the extent that it pretended to impose that disqualification, be clearly unconstitutional.

I submit, then, that there is nothing in the existence of that act of the 17th of July which gives the slightest weight to the argument in support of the first law of the 2d of July, on two grounds: first, because that law was passed after the oath-law was passed; and second, because the offenses which it provides against are not the offenses or all the offenses included within the oath-law, but exclusively offenses consisting in acts committed after the passage of the crimes act.

Now, Mr. President, have we any authority under the Constitution, independent of legislation, to pass such a resolution as this? I have, to a certain extent, anticipated the argument upon this head. The honorable member from Rhode Island supposes that the right to pass such a provision is to be found in a single sentence in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, delivered by Chief Justice Marshall. Sir, that is an entire mistake. The opinion contains no doctrine that aids the proposition for which he cited it. The question before the Supreme Court in that case was whether the charter of the Bank of the United States was constitutional. The argument against its constitutionality was that there was no express power in the Constitution to charter a bank, and not only that there was no express power in the Constitution, but that the proposition to give the power, made in the Convention, had been voted down. It was objected to, too, upon the ground that it could not have been passed in the exercise of any implied power, because the true meaning of that clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress the authority to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers granted to Congress meant only those that were absolutely necessary, those without which the powers granted could not be executed. The Chief Justice is dealing with that argument. He goes on very satisfactorily to show that to limit the implied powers to be found in the clause to which I have just adverted to such as should be absolutely necessary to make effectual the express powers, would be to defeat the most important provisions of the instrument; and in illustrating that he says:

"The powers vested in Congress may certainly be carried into execution without prescribing an oath of office. The power to exact this security for the faithful performance of duty is not given, nor is it indispensably necessary. The different departments may be established; taxes may be imposed and collected; armies and navies may be raised and maintained; and money may be borrowed, without requiring an oath of office. It might be argued with much plausibility, as other incidental powers have been asserted, that the Convention was not unmindful of this subject. The oath which might be exacted—that of fidelity to the Constitution—is prescribed, and no other can be required. Yet he would be charged with insanity who should contend that the legislature might not superadd to the oath directed by the Constitution such other oath of office as its wisdom might suggest."

Prescribe it to whom? To those who had an office to discharge; to nobody else. To prescribe it to what extent? To prescribe what kind of an oath? An oath consistent with the oath required to be taken by the Constitution, not an oath in conflict with it. Now what is the oath required by the Constitution? An oath to support the Constitution of the United States. When? Then, when taken, and for all time thereafter. Not an oath that they had from the beginning supported it. Not an oath negatively denying that they had committed any act which would have been hostile to the Constitution of the United States in the past, but an oath dealing with the present and the future, that now and hereafter I will support the Constitution. Suppose the oath is taken; that is one way to test it. Suppose the oath is taken and the man is loyal now, repentant of his past offense, aroused to the necessity of allegiance, loyal now and continues loyal, would you turn him out by an indictment for perjury for the violation of that oath upon proving that he had at some antecedent time committed the offense of treason against the United States? Everybody will say not. Whether they were wise or unwise in making the oath of allegiance to commence at the period when it is taken and to date thereafter, or whether it would have been better to make it retroactive, is a matter with which the Senate have nothing to do. That was a question before the Convention. The Convention had a right to decide for itself and the people had a right to decide for themselves when they adopted it what kind of oath they would require; and if they required an oath binding only to present and future obedience I should like to see any reason upon which the authority can be placed that Congress can require an oath more than coextensive, inconsistent, with that oath of office.

What is the practical illustration of it here, Mr. President? The most of the Senators upon the floor have taken only that oath which the Constitution prescribes. Who knows—I have a right to assume it for the sake of the argument, though the fact is not so—who knows judicially that several of the members sworn in my presence have not in the past committed an act of disloyalty to the United States that might have been punished? Nobody can know it. You say to the Senators who have come in since the passage of this act—for by its terms it applies only to those elected or appointed in the future—"In addition to the oath taken by your associates, you must take an oath that you never have committed this offense in the past." Sir, I thought we were here equals in the eye of the Constitution, having the same rights as well as bound by the same obligations; and I want to know upon what ground of reason, upon what show of authority, upon what principle of propriety the Senators who are here, only qualified because they have taken the oath prescribed in the Constitution, have a right to say to me who have come in since, "Your conscience cannot be trusted; your word cannot be relied upon; the safety of the land demands that, as against you, you should swear that you have never committed an offense in the past." Did the Constitution of the United States ever contemplate such a distinction as to the qualification of members upon this floor? The honorable member from Maine who is before me [Mr. FESSENDEN] has only taken the oath which the Constitution prescribes. Is he not here a Senator? Does this law apply to him? It excludes him by its terms, but it applies to me. I take the same oath that he has taken; but then I assume that he gets up in his place and says, "That will not do; you are not to be trusted upon the security which you give by the taking of that oath; we want to make in your case 'assurance doubly sure'; take another, and if you do not take the other you cannot sit alongside of me; I am in that respect more than your equal."

It is not, therefore, as I think the Senate will see—certainly the proposition is very clear to my own judgment—whether you can by legislation impose an oath of office ancillary to, cumulative of, the oath prescribed by the Constitution; but whether you can prescribe by legislation an oath inconsistent with the oath prescribed by the Constitution. You cannot by legislation alter that oath, as I suppose everybody will admit. The proposition that instead of taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution you are to take an oath such as may be required in the particular law containing the provision, everybody would say is unconstitutional. Why? Only because the oath contained in the Constitution is one which, being there, is without the reach of legislative control of this department of the Government. But can it not be modified, changed by being added to, as well as being subtracted from? Can it not be altogether changed, or changed in many material respects, by incorporating into it what was not in it before, as well as by taking out of it anything which was in it before?

Now, if you cannot change directly the constitutional oath by saying that instead of taking that a man shall take an oath which will deal with the past as well as with the future, does it not necessarily follow that you cannot do the same thing by leaving that oath in terms unaffected by legislation, but affected substantially in its operation? The oath of office, from the very nature of the Constitution, excludes any oath inconsistent with or which enlarges that oath of office. I do not mean by that a mere oath of office that the party will discharge the functions of the particular office, but an oath of allegiance which is more than coextensive with the meaning of the oath of allegiance prescribed by the Constitution is obnoxious to the objection that that is a law (if provided for by law) which changes, modifies in a very material respect a provision of the Constitution, intended to be altogether without the control of the legislative power. Now, as I understand it—and a word only in reference to the application of the authority I am about to cite, and I shall have done—in the case of Barker vs. The People, reported in 3 Cowen's Reports, the question was whether an act to prohibit dueling, the punishment of which it was provided should be, in part, disqualification for office, was in that particular constitutional. The court of errors of New York decided that it was constitutional because, under the general authority to legislate over all crimes, they had the authority to affix any punishment that they thought proper; but the judge said, in delivering the opinion: "Important as this right is," that is, the right of holding office, "it stands as the right to life itself stands, subject to the general power of the Legislature over crimes and punishments. As a right flowing from the Constitution, it cannot be taken away by any law declaring that classes of men, or even a single person not convicted of a public offense, shall be ineligible to public stations." But this law (and the validity of it, as I stated just now, is put by the honorable member from Vermont upon that ground) punishes by disqualification without conviction, because, as he says, you cannot get evidence to convict, or cannot get a court and a jury that will convict.

Mr. President, I have done, except as to a very few thoughts which I will submit to the Senate upon the expediency of enforcing this legislation, if it is to be considered as a matter of expediency. The war in which we are engaged was at the first unquestionably only constitutional, and could only have been waged because it was necessary to restore the authority of the Government. That is very clear. Congress had no power to suppress insurrection or rebellion except the power which the Constitution gives. The President had no executive authority looking to the same end except the authority which the Constitution gives him. The authority in both cases is limited to the attainment of the specific end for which it was given. That end is the suppression of the rebellion. Whether the rebellion culminates into what may be considered as a civil war, or is found only to be carried on by a few citizens, is immaterial.

The purpose of vesting in Congress and in the Executive the powers with which they are clothed to put down an insurrection or rebellion was merely to put it down, and nothing else. When down the power is at an end. It grows up with the occasion, comes into existence with the occasion, and ends with the occasion. Therefore, the rebellion ended to-morrow in Virginia by the submission of her people, brings her back, in my view, to the Union. Why? As the Supreme Court say in the case to which I have adverted, the war which is being carried on, the powers which are being exerted by Congress and by the President under the authority of Congress are being exerted not as against States but as against citizens. The object of the Constitution was in that particular to change the authority of the Government from what was its authority under the Articles of Confederation. In the latter, what was to be done could only be done as against States. It was found full of mischief, pregnant with ruin. The men of the day were aroused to the necessity of constituting a Government capable of executing its own powers directly upon the individual citizen without the cooperation of the States and against their interference if they attempted to interfere. The Constitution, therefore, gives to Congress and gives to the Executive in certain cases the right to call into existence the power of the Union to put down rebellion or insurrection. Well, it is done. When done, the States are back; your courts are reestablished practically as well as legally; your authority is recognized; in a word the Constitution is in those States in force. Then, if it is unresisted, if rebellion is at an end, why in the name of Heaven are not the people of those States back in the same character in which they went out, as citizens of States of the United States?

Taking that view, the inexpediency of such a provision as this, in my judgment, is manifest. Do you not want them back? Every reflecting man, I am sure, to say nothing of mere humanity, would wish them back. Do you not want slaughter to terminate, suffering to end, fraternal relations to be restored, former prosperity to be revived? Do you not want us to stand in the family of nations one of the most powerful and the proudest over which banner ever floated? Everybody will say yes; everybody with a heart within his bosom will say yes; everybody who is proud of the past will say yes; everybody who recollects the associations of the past will say yes; everybody who looks to the glory we may achieve in the future will say yes. And how will you get them back? By keeping them out? By declaring by this proposed rule, "You are unworthy of association with us; with you, during no time to come, is there a locus penitentie, that you may be able to accomplish by prayers to heaven in order to escape the punishment hereafter for your sins committed in this unheard-of rebellion, as against us it is to remain now and forever a crime." Was that the purpose of the legislation of the act of July 17, 1862? Has a different policy taken possession of the public mind? Is subjugation the end for which this war is to be waged? Is extermination the object? Is every man and woman and child within the limits of these twelve or thirteen States to be slaughtered on their own hearthstones, although they are willing to come in as penitent sons and daughters, and pray for forgiveness and political absolution and swear to be faithful in the future, they and their posterity forever? I say that was not the view taken in 1862. The thirteenth section of that very crimes act of July 17, 1862, upon which the honorable member from Vermont places the constitutionality of the act in question, provided—

"That the President is hereby authorized at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions, and at such time, and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare."

Is it proposed to repeal that part of that law? No such proposition has been made yet. The President has issued his proclamation; he has declared amnesty in certain cases and upon certain conditions. That amnesty is now being availed of much more extensively, as I understand, than I had feared would be the case. They are coming in now by hundreds and by thousands, and when the military power of the rebels is at an end they will be flocking to your standard under the promise of that very amnesty, and to be again as they were in the past our brothers, bound and willing to have the same destiny during all time to come. Are we to keep them out? This resolution keeps them out. There is not one man in a thousand in the South who has not fallen into the vortex of this rebellion. Some men of hardy character, stubborn virtue, inflexible firmness, a loyalty that quailed before nothing, have been able to drag out a miserable existence, cheered only by the consciousness that they were doing right under the oppression and outrages to which they have been subjected in the rebel States.

For the most part, firmness has yielded; association has had its influence; the association of kindred and friends and neighbors has had its effect; and they have all, more or less, done acts that are treasonable under the Constitution. You cannot exile them; and what a dreadful spectacle it would be if you could, provided they were willing to come in, and yield obedience to the authorities of the United States! Drive six millions of people out of the limits of the United States, wanders upon the world! It would be a shocking spectacle in this age of humanity and civilization. It would be still worse to exterminate them than to exile them; and infinitely worse, to a proud and sensitive people, to hold them as slaves. You, gentlemen of the free States, and I honor you for it—it is but an opinion which I have entertained coeval with my existence since I was capable of thinking—think that slavery is wrong; that slavery is a sin. I think so, too; but it is a thing not to be interfered with unnecessarily and at once, because that interference leads to greater evils to the slave and to the master; but it is in the end to be extinguished. I entertain that opinion, too. Why do you and I entertain it? Because of our conviction of the immorality, and, so to speak, the illegality, because of the immorality of the institution, because slavery itself shocks the heart of a free man which beats true to the inspiration of the goddess of liberty. Being so, do you want to make slaves of the white men? Are you not making them slaves? I do not mean by manaculating them, applying the lash to them, forcing them into involuntary labor, but by denying to them political equality, equal rights. What man who is worthy to stand upon this floor, or in any other Chamber where the principles of liberty are recognized, would not prefer death a thousand times to being subjected by mere brute power to political degradation? And let not gentlemen believe that such degradation is necessary for the purpose of putting down this rebellion. Let them not apprehend that these persons are not to be won back after the military power which they have wielded has been frustrated. Unless all the signs of the times are false the day is fast approaching, and will be sure to approach, if the power of this Government is wielded as it should be, when the military strength of the rebellion will be extinguished; and that accomplished, there will arise in all its original power that love of the Union, that reverence for our forefathers, that pride in our common glory, that desire to share in the achievements which we have won together in the past, to bring them back again to act with us as brethren, brethren in heart as well as in deed; when the country will go on and be, as it was once said by a statesman now no more, whose eloquence is world-renowned, whose majestic intellect astounded as well as informed, the native of New Hampshire, the citizen of Massachusetts, but the property of the Union, not a consolidated but a united Government—

"Not chaos-like, together crushed and bruis'd,
But, like the world, harmoniously confused,
Where order in variety we see,
And where, though all things differ, all agree."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] to strike out all of the resolution after the word "resolved," and insert:

That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether Senators and Representatives are included within the provisions of the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, and whether the said act is in accordance or in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SAULSBURY called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Harding, Henderson; Hendricks, Johnson, Powell, Saulsbury, Willey, and Wright—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Comness, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Hicks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wilson—26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution, Mr. POWELL called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the measure which is now proposed, I wish, as I intend to vote in the affirmative, briefly to state the reasons which will govern me. The proposition now before the Senate, simply stated, is to adopt among our standing orders one requiring that hereafter every person presenting himself for admission into this body shall be required to take the oath prescribed in the act of Congress of the 2d July, 1862; and I suppose that if we shall adopt such a rule, and if thereafter any person shall present himself for admission here who shall refuse to take the oath prescribed in that statute, he will necessarily be excluded from the body. What is the oath which the act of 1862 requires to be administered and taken? It is as follows:

"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought nor accepted nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States, hostile or inimical thereto. And I do further swear (or affirm) that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God."

Such, Mr. President, is the oath which we propose to require of a new, incoming Senator. I shall not here stop to discuss the question of the mere expediency of requiring the taking of this oath, nor shall I stop to discuss the question raised by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] whether we are not in adopting this rule proscribing loyal citizens of the United States, and endeavoring to force them forever into a condition of political inequality with us. I think, however, it is late in the day to say to the Senate of the United States that we are committing a wrong, a grievous wrong against persons now in rebellion against the United States, persons who are leading on the armies of treason against the loyal Government of the United States, and whose hands are red with the blood of innocent loyalty; I think it is rather late in the day to tell us that we are committing an injustice against that class of persons when we simply ask them, or their representatives who may hereafter present themselves in this Chamber, to take such an oath as that which I have just read from the statutes.

For one, sir, I am free to say that until these rebels and their representatives shall by their conduct as well as their declarations purge themselves of all just suspicion of hostility to the Government which I serve, I will, to the extent of my ability, and so, let me say, will my constituents, hold them to be in a state of political inequality until they shall be tired of it. I have no particular regard for the rights of persons who have committed treason against the Government and murdered its loyal citizens.

But, sir, to quit this digression, let us come to the two principal points of objection which are raised against the adoption of this rule. The first one insisted upon strenuously by the honorable Senator from Delaware and by the honorable Senator from Maryland is that by the terms of this act of 1862 Senators and members of the House of Representatives are not included in it, and that therefore the oath embraced in the statute cannot be required at their hands. On this subject we have had, it seems to me, a good deal of ingenious argument and ingenious construction; but it has all failed to convince me—I speak for myself—that the terms of the act do not require of members of Congress the taking of this oath. It seems to my mind quite plain that it is the only construction which you can give to the statute. Let us read it more particularly:

“Be it enacted, &c., That hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, excepting the President of the United States, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any of the salary or emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation.”

Now, sir, it is alleged in support of the first objection, that a Senator of the United States is not a civil officer of the United States. Suppose, for the sake of argument, we grant that in the sense of the Constitution a Senator is not a civil officer, does it necessarily follow that because he is not he is not embraced within the terms and meaning of this statute? Not at all. The statute says nothing about a civil officer of the United States; it speaks of every person “elected or appointed” to any office of trust, honor, or profit in the three departments of the Government mentioned in the statute, to wit, the civil department, the military department, and the naval department of the public service. Every person elected, as well as every one appointed, is subject to the application of the statute. Now, that this language was not intended to be applied exclusively to the civil officers of the United States spoken of in the Constitution, is to my mind entirely obvious. How are the civil officers of the United States appointed? How do they obtain their office? By what process is it that they are inducted into an office and enabled to enjoy its emoluments? Not by an election, because an election implies the action of some popular body. They obtain it by the appointment of the Executive and the confirmation of the Senate. But this act does not restrict itself to persons who may be appointed in that constitutional manner. It goes further. It extends to all persons who may be elected to any one of these three branches of the public service. Is not a Senator elected? Yes, sir. Are not Representatives elected? Yes, sir. Is not the Vice President of the United States elected? Yes, sir. All these classes of public functionaries hold their offices by means of an election.

Now, upon what principle of construction it is that the learned Senator from Maryland and the equally learned Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] can contend that this statute may apply by its terms to civil officers, those appointed by the President of the United States, and not apply to those persons who are elected, that is, Senators and Representatives, I cannot understand. If a person is employed in any one of these three branches of the public service, the civil service, the military service, or the naval service of the United States, whether he obtains that office or post by virtue of an election or an executive appointment, becomes plainly enough within the very language of the statute. An inquiry as to what classes of persons its terms include, leads directly to this result.

Again, sir, the act provides that the “said oath, so taken and signed, shall be preserved among the files of the court, House of Congress, or Department to which the said office may appertain,” intimating plainly that the intention of Congress, in the passage of the act, was that every member of the Senate and every member of the House of Representatives should take the oath and sign it, and that the oath itself, thus written and signed, should be filed away in the archives of the body to which the member belonged. I can draw no other conclusion from the language. It was clearly the intention of Congress in passing the act to apply it as well to Senators and Representatives in Congress as to any other persons engaged in any one of these three branches of the public service.

Now, sir, had Congress the power under the Constitution to pass this statute thus requiring this oath in addition to the oath required by the Constitution from members of this House and the other? If we have not that power, we ought not to attempt to exercise it; it would be vain, nugatory, and worse than useless; but if we have the power, then the only remaining question for the Senate to determine will be whether it is worth while to adopt a rule of this body for the purpose of carrying out the statute. It is very true that there is no express clause of the Constitution authorizing Congress to exact such an oath. I concede at once the soundness of the doctrine laid down by the Senator from Maryland, that unless this power is contained in some express clause of the Constitution, or derived by natural, reasonable, necessary implication from the Constitution, we do not possess it. But, sir, upon this question I cannot entertain the slightest doubt. When we read the instrument we see at once that the vital blood of the Constitution, its animating principle, without which it is a dead letter, inoperative, and totally worthless, is fidelity to the principles and a willing obedience to the commands of the instrument. Without this friendship for the Constitution, without a ready and cordial obedience to its commands, without an earnest, honest, sincere, pure intention to carry out its provisions, and execute it during all time, it would, as an instrument of government, be entirely nugatory and a dead letter. Its vital principle is fidelity to it on the part of those who are intrusted with its execution. Without this fidelity it is worthless. With it, I trust in Heaven it will endure forever.

Now, sir, upon principle it strikes me that it would be very strange if, as we are bound by oath to support this Constitution, as it is our duty perpetually to support and enforce it—it would be strange indeed if we were totally powerless as to all the means of obtaining security for the future, with a view to that great end. The Constitution declares in so many words:

“The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution.”

The form of the oath or affirmation is not given in the Constitution; and the omission of it plainly implies a power on the part of Congress to pass some statute which shall carry out and execute the purpose and intention of the Convention in adopting that particular clause.

Sir, what is it to support the Constitution? What does this language imply? What is this duty? It certainly does not mean a mere indifference to the continuance of the Constitution as an instrument of government. It means something more than mere carelessness and apathy. It means a continued, sincere, honest, and pure intention of the person to whom the execution of its powers is intrusted, actively to carry out its provisions; to support it, to uphold it, to defend it, to maintain it on all occasions, and in every manner in which it may become necessary to resist and overthrow its enemies. And now we are told that the only security which the country has under the oath of office required by the Constitution in these brief terms is simply and solely the promise before God of a man who presents himself in this Senate that he will for the future support and uphold it. Sir, I think this is a very narrow, a very imperfect, and a very inadequate view of all the duty so plainly required of us by this clause. We well know that by the common law on any trial of an issue, however inconsiderable, in however insignificant a court of justice, it is the right of the party against whom a witness is produced to put him on his voir dire, his oath, for the purpose of ascertaining whether he is free from all interest and all bias in the testimony he shall give. If every court of justice may do this in controversies between individuals—if this natural and rational precaution may be demanded in the smallest private affairs—shall it be said that the Senate of the United States is more liable to imposition and has less power of self-protection than a justice's court—that it is wholly impotent and imbecile? Why is it that the witness is interrogated as to his interest and his bias before he is allowed to testify? Because it is necessary to the purity of the stream of justice, and to its impartial administration, that a witness shall not be allowed to testify to facts who is tainted with the objection of interest? No, sir; this objection is entirely untenable. We must have a right to go back and inquire into the antecedents of the person who presents himself here for admission. The first inquiry should be whether this promise, imperatively exacted by the Constitution, to support it, is likely to be kept; for if the man is not likely to keep his oath, if it shall appear probable that he is as likely to go away to-morrow and break it as he is to take it to-day, then it is evident that the oath will have no binding effect on his conscience, and is an idle ceremony, a wicked mockery.

The act of July 2, 1862, like the resolution under consideration, requires the applicant to purge himself upon oath before he is admitted to a seat in this body. Why is this? It is that he may give to the Government which he offers to serve and to the country an assurance that he has never by any act of his committed an act of hostility to the Government, thus furnishing an additional security, an additional pledge, that he will never violate the oath he has taken, by acting falsely or traitorously to his country and its Government. Nor is there any hardship in this, Mr. President. Any man who has once willingly borne arms against the Government of the United States or yielded aid and comfort to this atrocious rebellion, any man who has deliberately and without coercion sought to overthrow the Government, to displace its authorities, and to institute another government upon its ruins, is totally unworthy of a seat in either House of Congress. He is not to be trusted, because his previous acts have settled the question as to his probable fidelity for the future; his previous conduct has shown that he is not worthy of the high trust he seeks. Like the position of a witness who has an interest in the issue upon trial, his previous history excludes him entirely from the right of appearing and taking part with loyal men in the administration of this Government.

There is nothing in this oath which is in any way inconsistent with the requirements of the Constitution. It is not in hostility but in addition to and in affirmation and support of the oath or affirmation expressly required by the sixth article. It is simply furnishing to the country a further and more perfect assurance and security against the possibility of the applicant violating his oath and again turning his arms against his country, and in this view of the subject I cannot hesitate as to the power of Congress to pass the act, and the power of the Senate to adopt the rule which is now pending before us.

Much has been said about the cases of Blount and Smith, at a former period of our history attempted to be impeached. If I understand it rightly, the only point decided in those cases; or either of them, was this: that for the purpose of impeachment by the House of Representatives, and trial in the Senate, a Senator is not to be regarded as a civil officer of the United States. That is the whole extent of the decision. It goes no further, and confines itself strictly and plainly to that. Undoubtedly, that decision is perfectly correct, because, for the purposes of impeachment, very clearly a Senator is not a civil officer of the United States. I do not look upon the requirement contemplated in this rule as any punishment of the person of whom the oath may be required. It has been denounced here as inflicting a punishment upon the applicant. What punishment? Does it deprive him of his personal liberty? No, sir. Does it affect him in his goods or estate in any way whatever? No, sir, not in the slightest degree. It neither takes his life, nor his liberty, nor his property; and it seems to me to be entirely idle to attempt to give such an effect to it as has been forced upon it by the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Maryland. It inflicts no punishment, it deprives the applicant of nothing which is his; it is only taking additional security for the future against any disloyal or treasonable act by compelling him to declare upon his oath that he has not hitherto evinced a spirit hostile to the Government by acts of treason and rebellion.

These are the reasons, very briefly given, Mr. President, which will govern the vote I shall give upon the passage of this resolution. I think the times require it. I think it is due to the purity of the Senate that we should adopt this rule, and exclude for all time to come persons who come here with no other recommendation to the favor of the Senate or the country except that, although they have imbrued their hands in the blood of their countrymen, borne arms against their Government, and perpetrated every atrocity, every brutality which their ingenuity could devise or their power enable them to perpetrate, still they are willing now to come into the Senate and declare that for the future they will be good and loyal citizens, and will observe and support the Constitution of the United States!

Sir, I have no such tender regard for this class of persons; and let me say to the Senators on the other side that whether this rebellion is to be put down or not, whether there is to be a subjugation of the southern population or not, we shall be acting a very childish and very foolish part to demand no other security from the leaders of the rebellion than a promise, on their already violated oath, that hereafter they will support the Constitution of the United States. Sir, I will never be wheedled and cheated in this way. If cases shall arise hereafter in which this statute may operate severely upon a man of undoubted loyal intentions and purposes and good character, there will be time enough for the two Houses of Congress to consider whether they will repeal or relax it in his particular case. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

But let me tell Senators here, Senators from the border States as well as others, that the people of the North are not such fools as to fight through such a war as this, to spend so vast an amount of treasure as they must necessarily spend in bringing it to a successful termination—they are not such fools as to sacrifice a hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand lives in putting down this rebellion, and then turn round and say to the traitors, "All you have to do is to come back into the councils of the nation and take an oath that henceforth you will be true to the Government." Sir, it would be simple imbecility, folly; and for one I will never, whatever may be the cost or the consequences of this war, or however long it may continue, be consciously guilty of such weakness and such folly.

Mr. FOOT. I do not rise, Mr. President, with any purpose of debating the question of the constitutionality of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes;" nor, admitting or assuming that act to be a valid one within the purview of the Constitution, do I propose to discuss the question whether it is applicable to and embraces members of Congress within its obligations. I have no difficulty or doubt in my own mind in respect to these questions. I have already testified in a practical way my own individual judgment of the binding force and obligation of that act upon members of this body by taking and subscribing to the oath which it prescribes. The only query or doubt in my mind is in reference to the necessity, or in reference to the expediency or the propriety even of incorporating into the rules of the Senate a requirement or obligation which the law itself imposes upon us, as though the law itself was not a sufficient rule to enable the Senate to enforce the obligation which the law itself creates.

I have taken and subscribed that oath with other Senators, not, however, by force and virtue of any rule of the Senate, but only by force and virtue of the higher mandate of the law of the land. That law stands upon your statute-book, and it requires that, before we enter upon the duties of our office, and before being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, we shall take and subscribe a certain prescribed oath. That is the law, sir; that is the positive requirement of the law. Can you make it any stronger, any more obligatory by any rule of the Senate? Do you add anything of weight or obligation to this law of Congress by a mere rule of the Senate? Do you add anything of strength or force to this positive requirement of law by a mere Senate rule? Do you add anything to the duty and obligation of Senators to comply with the positive requirement of an act of Congress by a mere legislative rule of parliamentary practice? None whatever; and hence there is no necessity for the proposed rule; there is no occasion for it; there is nothing to be gained by it; and, I will superadd here, there is no precedent for it.

The rules of the Senate, Mr. President, as indeed of all legislative or deliberative bodies, are made solely and only for the purpose of maintaining the order and of regulating the mode of legislative or executive proceedings in the body itself. They give no additional sanction or authority to an act of Congress. Nobody contends that. The duty and obligation of Senators to take and subscribe this oath, and the right and authority of the Senate to enforce that obligation, rest upon and are derived from the authority of a positive public law; and the performance of that obligation, or the exercise of that authority, is not at all dependent, and never can possibly be made dependent, upon any rule of the Senate. A rule of the Senate required in order to enable the Senate to execute this law, to require this oath to be administered to Senators! Why, sir, we all took at your desk and in open Senate an oath to support the Constitution of the United States before we entered upon our duties here; and why? Not because it was required of us by any rule of the Senate; for we have no such rule; we never had any such rule; but we took that oath in obedience to the requirement of law, and not of parliamentary rule.

The act of 1789, the first act of the First Congress of the United States, the first act upon your statute-book, is an act to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths. It prescribes the form of the oath required by the last clause of the sixth article of the Constitution. It requires, further, that this oath shall be administered by the President of the Senate for the time being to every Senator previous to his taking his seat; and from that day to the present time, now some seventy-five years, the requirements of this law have been observed, and without any rule of the Senate on the subject. During all this time, in conformity with the requirement and under the authority of the law, that Presiding Officer of the Senate has administered an oath to support the Constitution of the United States to every Senator before entering upon the duties of his office here as a Senator. Who ever thought of making it a rule of the Senate that this act of Congress should be enforced? Who ever thought it necessary to insert it in our Manual of rules and parliamentary government and law, that this oath to support the Constitution of the United States should be administered?

Mr. President, I ask again, what need is there, what occasion is there, for a rule of the Senate requiring the Senate to do what is already required of it to do by a more solemn and authoritative act of Congress? This oath prescribed by the act of July, 1862, the authority of the President of the Senate to administer that oath, the duty and obligation of Senators to take and subscribe that oath, are upon your statute-book, and can derive no aid, can need no aid, can receive no aid whatever, from a mere legislative rule of practice. These requirements are imposed by a solemn law of Congress, sanctioned by the concurrence of all the branches of the legislative department of the Government, and you can add not one whit of weight or authority to these requirements by any rule of the Senate.

Sir, it would be novel and anomalous, indeed, to incorporate in our rules of legislative practice a provision that the Senate shall observe the law; for that is all there is of it; or, in other words, that it shall not fail to do what the Constitution or the law commands it to do, or enjoins upon it to do. The Constitution authorizes the Senate to expel a member for cause, two thirds of the body concurring. Would you have it inserted in your Manual of rules that the Senate, when the proper case should arise, might exercise that power? The act of 1789, in pursuance of the constitutional requirement, directs that the President of the Senate shall administer an oath to support the Constitution of the United States to every Senator before he enters upon his duties here as a Senator. Would you have it inserted in the rules of the Senate that it shall obey the mandate of that law? Is a rule of the Senate necessary to enable the Senate to execute that law, or to require the oath to be administered, or to declare that he is not entitled to a seat here and thus vacate it if he refuses to take it?

The act of July, 1862, declares that hereafter every person who shall be elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, excepting the President of the United States—but not excepting members of Congress, by the way—before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to receive any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, shall take and subscribe the oath which it prescribes—plain, positive, mandatory. Can you make it more so by a rule of the Senate? Does it not rather imply that the law is deficient in some respect, and requires a rule of the Senate to patch it up? And it is now proposed to insert in the rules of this body that it shall obey the mandate of this law; that it shall not disregard or set at naught a requirement of a solemn act of Congress.

I have only to say once more, Mr. President, that the proposition pending before us is at least an anomalous one. I repeat, there is no necessity for it; there is no occasion for it; there is no call for it; there is no precedent for it; and it adds not the slightest weight or authority or sanction to an already existing, express legal obligation arising under the law itself. That law is plain and explicit in its terms, and if it be within the constitutional competency of Congress to enact that law, by its terms, without any rule upon the subject, no man is entitled to a seat on this floor as a Senator who shall refuse or decline to comply with the requirements of that law and to take and subscribe the oath which it prescribes, any more than would a member elect who should come here with his credentials and take his seat be entitled to hold that seat as a Senator if he should refuse or decline to comply with the requirements of the act of 1789, and to take the oath which it prescribes to support the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, we have no occasion for any rule at all on this subject as a rule of the body. I repeat, the law itself is our rule of action in the premises, and let that law be enforced, or let it be repealed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Before this debate closes I propose to submit some remarks to the Senate on this question; and if it is the wish of the Senate I will proceed now.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand the Senator to say he is not disposed to go on to-night?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I would rather proceed to-morrow morning, if it would be agreeable to the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw the motion to adjourn for a moment, to enable me to submit a motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senate are disposed to adjourn over, I will withdraw my motion for the present.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I now renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 21, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be the consideration of House resolution No. 18, to amend a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORRIS] is entitled to the floor.

WILLIAM GRACEY.

Mr. SMITH. I ask the unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the House the papers of William Gracey. They are the papers of a soldier who had both arms shot off in the Mexican war, and he desires the papers as papers of recommendation in order to get an office from the Government.

No objection being made, leave was granted.

STENOGRAPHER TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. HULBURD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer while conducting the investigation ordered by this House, at the usual price paid for reporting for the Daily Globe; and that the committee have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

A NEW RULE.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORRIS] who is entitled to the floor will yield a moment, I desire to make a report from the select committee on the rules. A resolution was sent to the committee on rules in relation to the appointment of an additional standing rule. That committee has met, and has directed me to report an additional rule, to which I presume there will be no objection.

The proposed rule was read, as follows:

Rule 148. An additional standing committee shall be appointed at the commencement of each Congress whose duties shall continue until the first session of the ensuing Congress, to consist of five members, to be entitled a Committee on a Uniform System of Coinage, Weights, and Measures; and to this committee shall be referred all bills, resolutions, and communications to the House upon that subject.

Mr. PENDLETON. I do not know that I shall object; but I desire to ask the gentleman who introduced the rule whether it is proposed to extend the power of the committee beyond the term of office of members?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman will notice that the language is precisely that contained in other rules.

Mr. PENDLETON. Then I have no objection.

Mr. DAWES. Under the rules, that rule will lay over one day.

The SPEAKER. It has laid over several weeks already.

The rule was adopted.

LANDS TO THE STATE OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. DRIGGS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting lands to the State of Michigan for the construction of a wagon road for postal and military purposes from Saginaw to the Straits of Mackinaw in said State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LANDS TO IOWA.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

Mr. LOAN, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the "Act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, and to pay interest on the public debt," approved July 1, 1862, as to authorize and empower the President to change the boundaries of the collection districts which he was authorized by the second section of said act to define, and to increase or diminish the number of said districts within the limit provided for in said act, from time to time, as in his judgment public interest may demand.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

The special order being called for, The SPEAKER stated that the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORRIS] was entitled to the floor upon the joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, which was the resolution under consideration in order.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, when the resolution now under discussion was before the Judiciary Committee, I approved of it without a thorough examination. I then thought as I now do, that it is not only safe but that it is wise to conform a law involving such weighty interests as does this to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

The Constitution, section three, article three, provides—

"The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained."

On the 17th day of July, 1862, in view of the treasonable rebellion in the land, and for the purpose of checking it, and of punishing the parties thereto, Congress passed and the President approved "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes." At the same date a joint resolution was passed and approved explanatory of the act in question. It is now proposed to amend the resolution of 1862 so as to make it and said act conform to the provisions of the Constitution. This being done, if any question arises under said act, it will be left to our courts for construction and adjudication. Section one of said act is as follows:

"That every person who shall hereafter commit the crime of treason against the United States, and shall be adjudged guilty thereof, shall suffer death, and all his slaves, if any, shall be declared and made free; or at the discretion of the court he shall be imprisoned for not less than five years and fined not less than $10,000, and all his slaves, if any, shall be declared and made free; said fine shall be levied and collected on any or all of the property, real and personal, excluding slaves, of which the said person so convicted was the owner at the time of committing the said crime, any sale or conveyance to the contrary notwithstanding."

This section provides for the punishment of treason after an offender is found guilty. Section five of said act provides—

"That to insure the speedy termination of the present rebellion, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to cause the seizure of all the estate and property, money, stocks, credits, and effects of the persons herein-after named in this section, and to apply and use the same and the proceeds thereof for the support of the Army of the United States."

It will be noticed that this section has no reference to treason or its punishment. The joint resolution of 1862 it is claimed restricts the operations of said act, as is evidenced by the following clause:

"Nor shall any punishment or proceedings under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life."

The resolution now pending proposes to amend and modify said clause and act, so that it shall read—

"Nor shall any punishment or proceeding under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the estate of the offender except during his life. This amendment being intended to limit the operation and effect of the said resolution and act, and the same are hereby limited, only so far as to make them conform to section three, article three of the Constitution of the United States."

I apprehend all will agree that under the act of 1862, were it not for the restrictive clause of the explanatory resolution now sought to be amended, the fee of the real estate of those named in section five could be confiscated, unless the provisions of the Constitution inhibit it. I will here say, though I do not propose to argue the question, nor is it germane to the subject in hand, that I have great doubt whether the resolution of 1862 in the least restricts the act referred to. This brings me to the question as to the propriety and the effect of the amendment.

My colleague [Mr. KERNAN] alleged—

"We have from the President a statement that any attempt by Congress or by the law-making power to make as a part punishment of treason the forfeiture of a greater estate in lands than a life estate of the offender would be unconstitutional."

It is sufficient, in reply to this, to say there is no attempt made, and no purpose even hinted at in the act of 1862,

"To make as a part punishment of treason the forfeiture of a greater estate in lands than a life estate."

The act provides for the punishment of treason. This the Constitution expressly authorizes. The punishment prescribed by section one, is, first, death, and the freedom of the offender's slaves. Of this there is no complaint. Second, it provides for a fine and imprisonment of the offender. There is no forfeiture in this. The clause in the Constitution was not intended nor has it ever been held that it prevented the collection of fines by a sale of an offender's real estate. Even in slight misdemeanors this is done; much more can it be done in punishment of the highest crime known to our laws. Forfeiture in England was not the punishment prescribed by statute, it was the result of a conviction by virtue of the common law.

The attainder, taint of treason, worked a forfeiture independent of the statute. Somewhat analogous are some of our laws. Any person, upon conviction and sentence for a felony, forfeits his citizenship. This consequence results without its being named in the statute defining felony and prescribing its punishment. This effect is the taint or workings of felony. Should a colony of citizens from the United States set up a government in one of the islands of the Pacific, knowing that under the laws with which they were familiar a conviction and sentence for felony worked a forfeiture (loss) of citizenship without its being specified in the statute naming the punishment, and should they wish to restrict the effects of punishment to the strict terms of the statute, and to what must necessarily grow out of them, they would be likely to insert a clause in their organic law similar to the clause in question. The object would be not to inhibit the law-making power from declaring that a person convicted of felony should be imprisoned and forfeit his citizenship, but it would be to inhibit it unless it was made part of the penalty by statute.

A bill of attainder was an act of Parliament, and passed just as any other law. It named the particular person, defined the crime, and passed sentence. This is guarded against by article one, section nine, of our Constitution; but attainder remains; it is only the bill of attainder that is prohibited. Attainder in itself is the taint, disgrace, or blemish growing out of a conviction or bill. Attainder of treason, like forfeiture, was not mentioned in the statute as a part punishment of treason; it grew out, or resulted in consequence, of a conviction or bill.

Now, as I understand the framers of the Constitution, they intended and did prohibit bills of attainder, and they provided that attainder, the taint, the fact of a conviction should not work a forfeiture or loss of civil rights or property in and of itself. Or in other words, the carrying of any sentence into execution necessarily works certain consequences. As the imprisonment of an offender necessarily deprives him of the society of his friends and the care of his property these need not be specified, but a loss of property or of citizenship after the expiration of his imprisonment does not necessarily follow. To work this result a warrant for it must be found either in the statutory or in the common law. The framers of the Constitution meant, then, to say, and they do say, nothing shall follow from a conviction for treason, except what inevitably results, unless it is expressly stated by the law-making power. And then even this requires that the sentence must be carried into effect during the life of the offender. It cannot be done, as it was in England, after the death of the criminal. What adds force to this last view is the fact that forfeiture in law means a mode of changing title. When the title of property passes by contract it is voluntary. When it is changed by forfeiture, it is against the owner's will. If, then, we substitute the meaning of forfeiture for the word itself, the clause in the Constitution would read, "or take from the traitor his title to his property, except during his life;" that is, except it be done during his life. No matter how guilty the person is, if he dies before sentence the execution of the law is suspended. Hence the meaning is, not that the forfeiture terminates with the life of the offender, but that the judgment of the court must be executed during his life.

Section fifth of the act, as I have before stated, has no reference to treason or its punishment. This section is little else than a coercive war measure. The President as Commander-in-Chief of our armies, by his proclamation, might have directed the same thing. The rebels are treated as belligerents; hence it follows the Commander-in-Chief may seize their property and confiscate it. I do not clearly see how these rebels can claim the protection of the Constitution. Indeed, I do not know that they do, unless members on this floor are their agents and representatives. These men, as I understand it, despise and reject our Constitution. A person who claims the protection of law must respect and obey it. They do not reside with us, and they claim to be aliens. Talk then of the rights of a rebel under our Constitution, by him abjured and defied; talk of the rights of an outlaw! As well can I comprehend you when you talk of a holy sinner, an honest thief, or a loyal traitor. It is not questioned by the opponents of this bill that the entire personal estate of an offender may be seized and appropriated; but they insist only the life estate of his real property can be sold. Why is this? What warrant have they for this distinction? The Constitution and our courts are silent upon this point, and under the English there was no distinction of this kind. Have they rebel authority for it? If so, I have not seen it. But I am discussing what I did not intend to; my colleagues have treated this subject so ably that I shall pass on.

It is alleged by my colleague [Mr. KERNAN] that the President held the act of 1862 to be unconstitutional, and had prepared his message to veto it; and then the resolution of 1862 was prepared and passed to meet the views of the President upon this point. The President's scruples in this behalf arose, as it appears, from the supposition that the Constitution inhibited the confiscation of the fee of an offender's real estate. I understand my colleague concurs in this view. I have great respect for the opinions of the President, and I know my colleague to be a sound lawyer; hence, in differing with them on this point, I have had some misgivings. But when I remember that the amendment only proposes to conform the resolution and act of 1862 to the provisions of the Constitution, I congratulate the friends of this bill that the President at least, if not my colleague, has no tenable reason for differing with the Judiciary Committee.

This being so, I cannot see how any well-grounded objections can be urged against the amendment, unless the objector thinks the Constitution at fault.

I understand that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and some others, are in favor of an entire repeal of the resolution of 1862. The amendment in question practically does this, for the repeal of the resolution would leave the act to the construction of our courts, subject to the restrictions, if any, of the Constitution. The passage of this amendment does the same thing, and at the same time removes any objections that may have arisen or shall arise in the mind of the President. If I am correct, then will the amendment be concurred in by all except such as are mistaken, or think the Constitution is cruel and unjust. Will the opponents of this amendment arraign the Constitution? Will they repudiate the courts and seek to usurp their prerogative? I remember when the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] and his friends were great sticklers for our courts. Whence then this distrust? Is it to be attributed to the progress of the age, or does he see a writing upon the wall indicative of the finger of truth and justice? The friends of the amendment have entire confidence in the Constitution, and they believe our courts upon examination will not fail to give its provisions full force and effect.

Here I might stop, and should do so, were it not for the line of remark indulged in by honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House. The eloquent gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] holds that this bill "proposes to despoil the children of their inheritance for the crime of the parent." In his kindness he manifested a marked sympathy for these innocent children of the traitors now waging war against the Government of their own choice. By what authority he speaks and acts for this class, once subjects and citizens of this Government, I am not informed. Sir, I admit the importance of charity and kindness; I concede that these children have an able and zealous champion, if not an apologist, for their outlaw fathers upon this floor. But I am not willing to admit the correctness of his conclusions, or that his sympathies are sufficiently comprehensive.

We are in the midst of a wicked and unprovoked rebellion. It was concocted and brought on by the ungrateful fathers of the children for whom the honorable gentleman so eloquently and feelingly pleads.

Mr. COX. Do I understand the gentleman to charge that the member from Ohio to whom he has referred has ever been the apologist or the defender of a traitor?

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I do not so charge.

Mr. COX. Then you do not make any such charge?

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I do not, and the language will show I do not.

In our efforts to suppress this gigantic wrong we have, or soon shall have, expended one thousand million dollars, and filed some three hundred thousand new-made graves with murdered citizens. How is this enormous outlay of money to be repaid? Who ought to be punished for this wanton destruction of life? These are practical questions. These questions are to be answered by the agents of the loyal people here assembled. Three hundred thousand innocent men have been sacrificed; and shall their unoffending offspring now be required to pay the expenses consequent upon the overt acts of traitors and parricides? The real estate of the loyal soldier who sleeps in death at Chattanooga, at Gettysburg, or whose bones bleach uncared for beneath a southern sun, or furnish ornaments for inhuman mothers, may be sold to raise the taxes assessed to procure a substitute to fill his vacant place in the ranks of our armies. His widow, his orphans, guilty of no fault on their part, nor on the part of their murdered father, guilty of no crime, no prodigality, no neglect, are turned away homeless and beggared. They weep not for a home only, but also for a desolated country and the death of a husband and father. This scene the honorable gentleman entirely overlooked. His benign and Christian philanthropy yearned for the offspring of traitors, the progeny of fiends whose parricidal hands drip with the blood of butchered loyalists. In his magnanimity he would have them released from paying one penny into our depleted Treasury, and their real estate guarded with jealous care and restored to them in fee simple, with perhaps a group of human chattels to cultivate their lands and minister to their wants. Noble charity! Unexampled beneficence! Who would not wish to be a son of a traitor? The example will cheer and encourage not only Jeff. Davis, but the old arch traitor himself, and inspire the hope that his lost estate may yet be restored to his dear innocents now in arms against the Government—an estate real wrested in fee from the old fiend—some six thousand years since by authority of the constitution and laws of Almighty God. What a stupendous wrong was done to his innocent heirs! Here is a field for the activities and the eloquence of the honorable gentleman.

Mr. CHANLER. Under what law and in what spirit would the gentleman refuse, when peace is granted to this country by the Power which rules all nations, to grant to the offspring of a traitor the right to live in this country, to enjoy the protection of the law, to inherit property, and to carry on the system of creation? Under what law would he deny to the offspring of his family the right of inheritance?

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I will say to my colleague that I have not discussed that point yet, but I shall come to it after awhile; and I think I shall show him that I will extend to the children of a traitor the benign influences of Christianity; that I would protect them just as the children of murdered loyalists are protected at the North, notwithstanding their parents are guilty, if they earn their livelihood by prudence and industry, as northern children do.

Mr. CHANLER. I thank the gentleman. Then the shafts of his irony return upon himself. These children, according to his own admission, are to be protected under his own stipulation.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I would only reply that if the gentleman was not wounded he would not writhe.

I must confess I have my sympathies and my affinities; but they run in quite a different direction at this time. They mourn the error of the rebels in desolating our country and in entailing upon their children ignominy and poverty; they cluster around the orphans of the slaughtered "heroic dead." Allow me to say to the gentleman—

"The man who pauses in the paths of treason Halts on a quicksand—the first step ingulfs him."

I now ask, and I want this House to answer, is it unjust, is it wicked, is it unconstitutional to take the property of traitors to repair the ruin they themselves have wrought? I am not indifferent nor am I forgetful of their innocent offspring. They, in common with others, as is ever the case, must suffer in consequence of the errors, imprudence, mistakes, and crimes of their parents. They have this to encourage them, however, they are no worse off pecuniarily than thousands at the North; and if they are industrious and prudent, as are the children of the inhabitants of the laboring North, they will secure a competence, and reap a richer reward than idleness can ever bestow.

Should some villain in the absence of the honorable gentleman pilfer his goods, murder his wife, and burn his dwelling, would he ask no reparation; would not the law give it to him? Would his tenderness for the innocent children of the transgressor induce him to neglect his own? If the gentleman will undertake for all of the children who do not receive land in fee as the heirs of such as fail to transmit it to them in consequence of the prodigality, intemperance, and indiscretion of their fathers, saying nothing of crime, he will find ample scope for his benevolence and employment for life. Can it be said, in the language of the gentleman, "Such a system is the very wantonness and excess of tyranny?" If to take the property of a wrong-doer to pay in part the expenses of his own willful acts is what the gentleman says, then must we look for a new code of morality. Heaven pardons upon repentance and restitution for the injury done. There are conditions precedent in all cases. Are traitors an exception?

A few words more, and I have done. My colleague [Mr. KERNAN] said:

"I do believe that if we love our country, if we hope to see our people ever again living peacefully under a united Government, we should, toward the masses of the people in the rebellious States, hold out every inducement which the Government honorably can hold out to induce them to desert the secession leaders."

These are noble words, and I most cordially concur in the sentiments thus eloquently expressed.

But when the question comes, how shall this be done? the honorable gentleman and myself differ very widely. I much fear my colleague did not reflect that the great masses in the rebel armies are non-landholders. I find a defect in our census. They should give the number of landowners, and the amount owned by each. I would like to know just the number of landowners and the amount owned by each in the several rebel and in the several loyal States. In the absence of this, and having no actual data, I can only say I have always understood that the most of the lands in the rebel States, especially the cotton and sugar-growing ones, are owned by planters, and that each plantation is composed of a large tract of land.

The number of landowners, therefore, when compared with the balance of the population, must be small. I am also assured that these landowners, few as they are, for years have wielded the civil and the political influences which have controlled these States—that the white population, not owning lands, are as dependent and subservient to these “lords of the manor” as are the slaves. These landowners are the men who inaugurated and who are responsible for the rebellion now desolating our country. The masses yielded to these lords of the soil as did the masses to the usurpations of Louis Napoleon in France. These landowners and leaders of this insurrection are sustained by these masses, who are in the ranks of the rebel armies from necessity; and they and their leaders are fed and clothed from the labor of their slaves. Take these soldiers from their ranks, and these laborers from their fields and their shops, and where are these leaders?

The question is, how shall we win these masses from those who have thus deluded them? My colleague says by protecting, perpetuating, and securing to the heirs of these traitors their real estate in fee; thus, as I hold, enabling their descendants to continue a system that, like treason, works and has ever worked corruption of morals, destruction of civil rights, and which has begotten an aristocracy who are thundering at our gates and murdering our citizens. Will this withdraw the masses from their leaders?

History demonstrates that from the formation of any Government a struggle arises between two elements for the mastery. This ever has been, and perhaps ever will be. This struggle is not, as some allege, between freedom and slavery, but between capital and labor. I care not to what country you turn, or to what age of the world you look, you will find marked illustrations. You will also find that wherever labor, an ordinance of Heaven, is respected and properly compensated, it is in the ascendant, and a free Government is the fruit. This follows as certainly and as necessarily as grain from the combined influence of sunshine and showers. On the contrary, wherever capital gains the mastery, it becomes exacting, cruel, imperious, insolent, oppressive; labor is despised, degraded, and the fruit is an intolerable aristocracy.

This fruit wholly matured begets a monarchy. This, I insist, holds true in all ages and countries. It is as certain in a land where there are no negroes as it is where they abound. This truth is evidenced in our own country, as well as in others. At the North labor is respected, encouraged, compensated, and is the ruling power. Her lakes, rivers, canals, and workshops hum with business, and the sterile lands tell in eloquent language of its resources, happiness, and wealth. Here, too, freedom is as vigorous and stalwart as are the oaks of the forest. The avenues to place are as open to the sons of the laboring man as they are to the rich; and usually the former are found traversing them in reward of their intelligence and industry. This is not that northern men have any preeminence over others, but it is by reason of a system that produces this result. Let this system pervade our entire nation and its future will be as incomprehensible as eternity and as enduring as time.

Look at the States in rebellion. Here labor is despised, degraded, and uncompensated. Capital has long lorded it over its discomfited rival, and the fruit is apparent. It is now being gathered in tears and in blood. This is not because southern men are wanting in kindness or Christianity as compared with others; this is not because black men are there; but it is the inevitable fruit of a system. The practical workings would be the same with any race or color; adopt the same system, other things being equal, in Russia, England, or Ireland, and the same consequences will follow. I therefore talk of a system; a system as ruinous to white men as to colored; as ruinous to a free Government as is disloyalty. I point now to its workings as evidence of its danger and its wickedness. He who expects to remedy this evil by cherishing its cause, he who expects harmony without destroying the apple of discord, is as rational as is the inebriate who expects to repair his wasted fortunes, restore his health, and give comfort and happiness to his family by still adhering to his cups.

Sir, I would win these masses from their secession leaders by the hope of justice, protection, and freedom. I would confiscate the fee in the lands of these rebel knaves, and then I would parcel it in small farms and sell it at a living price to any actual settler who could purchase and pay for it, be he whom he may. Hold out this boon, set this beacon-light upon the hill-tops, and the masses will flee their leaders and hasten to our standard as “the panting hart to a water-brook.” Do this and the rebellion and the system that begat it are forever dead; do this and slavery and the system that loves it are dead. The hopes of a home, the possession and ownership of land guaranteed to those who have been coerced into this rebellion, will deplete the rebel ranks, strengthen our Government, replenish our Treasury, and inaugurate a system that will regenerate, redeem, and bless the entire South. Slavery, say you? The problem of slavery has been solved; if it ever had protection under the Constitution, the South have taken it out. The Almighty, as of old, has interposed, and the oppressed are passing through the receding waters, while their oppressors are about to be engulfed in the returning waves. What would I do with the slave? I would treat him as a man; he should have the rights of a citizen and the protection of our laws. Until this is secured to him Heaven will chasten, and we can have no permanent peace. These things being done, and we shall have a nation one in purpose, one in hope, one in sympathy, one in love, one in perpetuity. This being done, enterprise, industry, manufactures, commerce, the school-house, a code of laws by and under which all are equally protected, with free labor, and a development of the resources of the South now latent, will increase the material wealth of our country within thirty years the increase of which will pay our national debt and feed, clothe, educate, and induct into the paths of industry and usefulness the innocent children for whom so much sympathy has been manifested.

Sir, I look to the future in hope. A system will attain throughout our entire nation under which labor shall be respected and protected. With this system, and universal freedom, our national capital, our cities and towns both North and South, shall hum with business; our farmers shall drive their teams “afield” with joy; the Potomac, the rivers of our nation shall join in the labors of man, and wipe the perspiration from their ponderous brows as they bear upon their bosoms the accumulating products of the several States to our seaboard. And then old ocean, catching the enthusiasm at early dawn, shall rouse from his granite bed, fling back his covering, leap from his couch, and smilingly engage in a business which shall bring wealth to our nation and Christianity and universal freedom to man.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKET, their Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill of the House to amend the law prescribing the articles to be admitted into the mails of the United States.

The message further announced that Messrs. WADE, CHANDLER, and HARDING had been appointed the joint committee on the part of the Senate on the conduct and expenditures of the war.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY—AGAIN.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I would not attempt to take the time of this House upon any matter of ordinary importance; but when an attempt is made to subvert the great principles which actuated our forefathers in the formation of the Constitution by the passage of an act or joint resolution which is in direct conflict with the organic law, I would be derelict to my duty did I not rise and at least enter my protest against unconstitutional legislation; therefore I hope the honorable gentlemen who compose this House will not think me forward if I detain the House for a short time upon this grave and important subject.

When I took my seat in this House I took a solemn oath, and called God to witness the truth of it, that to the best of my knowledge and ability I would support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, and that I would bear true faith and allegiance to the same.

It is to sustain, protect, and defend that Constitution and uphold that oath that I deem it my duty to enter my protest against this attempted usurpation of constitutional power. And were it not that I cannot forget that we were born freemen and have a country to save, and that I conscientiously believe that it is the wilful, deliberate, and cherished design of the leading lights of this Administration to override the Constitution, blot out the fundamental counsel and noble doctrines of constitutional liberty, given and taught in the organic law by the wisdom of a Washington, a Jackson, and a Jefferson, and to lay at the feet of abolitionism the whole wisdom and genius of our fathers, I would not attempt to discuss such a momentous subject in the presence of so much abler, older, and more experienced men.

That joint resolution which the resolution under debate affects, has the proviso:

“Nor shall any punishment or proceedings under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life.”

I am opposed to repealing or altering the proviso of the resolution which gives the constitutional construction to the confiscation act upon several grounds.

First, it would leave the confiscation act unconstitutional without the constraining resolution.

Second, did I not oppose the repealing of the resolution I would violate my oath of office.

The language of the Constitution is very plain upon this subject, and never admitted of two opinions until this country had the misfortune to be governed by the radical policy of the party in power.

The Constitution says that Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason; but no attainer of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted; and it also says that—

“No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.”

Is not the Constitution very clear that the real estate of the offender cannot be forfeited beyond the life of the party? Why did the President of the United States insist that the joint resolution proposed to be repealed, which contains the words that no punishment or proceedings under said act shall be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life, should be passed before he would sign the confiscation bill? And why did a Republican Congress pass such joint resolution? Simply because they knew that a law making the forfeiture extend beyond the life of the offender would have been a plain violation of the Constitution and their oaths of office. Congress has no more constitutional power to pass a law that the forfeiture of the estate shall extend beyond the life of the offender than it has to pass a law that attainer of treason shall work corruption of blood; because the prohibition in the Constitution is as plain in the one case as in the other. If Congress have the constitutional right to pass a law forfeiting the estate of the traitor beyond his natural life and giving the purchaser a fee simple it has, by the same reasoning advanced by the learned gentlemen upon the other side of the House, a right to pass a law that will work corruption of blood.

Can it be that a doctrine so shocking to humanity and terrible in its consequences was ever contemplated by the wise, virtuous, and pure sages and heroes of the Revolution? It is a slander upon the fair fame of the founders of the Government, and a libel upon the honor and integrity of a free republican nation.

Does any man in his sober senses believe that those who were purified by the trials of the Revolution and covered with its glories assembled in the old Halls of Confederation and formed a Constitution which recognized the barbarous and cannibal-like doctrine of the common law upon the punishment and forfeiture annexed to the crime of treason, that the punishment for the offenses of the fathers should be visited upon the children?

If such was the wisdom of the great and good who had been induced to undergo the privations and hardships of the most desperate and determined struggle the world had ever seen, why did they not retain in this country those other barbarous and unchristian doctrines of the feudal law? I have too much faith in the noble attributes of character that actuated the heroes of Lexington, Trenton, Monmouth, and Valley Forge, to believe that, situated as they had been, they would have been the means of countenancing so vile and vicious a doctrine as that which destroys the inheritance of the innocent offspring on account of the crime of the parent. Why place in the Constitution the words, "but no attainer of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted," if it was contemplated for a moment that Congress could pass a law forfeiting the estate beyond the life of the offender? The intention of the makers of the Constitution must be governed by the subject-matter, the reason and the spirit of the law.

If it was intended that the object sought to be obtained by the provision in the Constitution limiting the forfeiture to the life of the person attainted could be got rid of in some other way than that pointed out by the Constitution, then that provision of the organic law amounts to nothing; but all the effects of the attainer of treason working corruption of blood, and forfeiting the estate forever, could be effected by some other proceedings than a bill of attainder, giving to the people of this country all the hideous atrocities of the common law upon this subject.

The honorable gentleman from Maryland says the joint resolution limiting the operation of the confiscation law to life estates, is, in his judgment, very unwise, and therefore he will vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which goes directly to the object sought to be accomplished by repealing the limiting resolution. He says there is no word in the law of the last Congress that attaches confiscation of property to conviction of the person for treason, to attainer of the person for treason, on a criminal proceeding in any court of justice; and if that be so, then the quotation of the clause from the Constitution is simply irrelevant to the matter in debate, for it is that no attainer of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the party; so that if there be no proceeding by indictment, there can be no attainer, and if there be no attainer there is nothing on which the residue of the words can operate. He says that simple observation disposes of the whole argument. He says the question is whether there is any process of law, however this provision be construed, by which we can effect a forfeiture of the whole fee in land.

I again ask, what is the reason and spirit of the Constitution, and what was the intention of the framers of it upon this subject? Will the gentleman deny that the object and intention of the law-makers were to annul that principle of the common law which forfeited the estate forever, and cut off the offspring and heirs forever; and if that was the intention of our ancestors, would the construction of the Constitution given by the learned gentleman effect that intention?

All the writers upon the construction of laws and constitutions agree that they must be so construed as to effect the intention of the law-makers; and that where laws will admit of two constructions, that which nearer conforms to the intention of the law-makers must be given. It would be a clear violation of the rules governing the construction of constitutions, statutes, and contracts, to give such construction to the Constitution as would allow another mode and manner than that pointed out by the organic law to forfeit the whole fee in the lands. Such construction should be given to the Constitution as would remedy the mischief of the common law intended to be remedied by its framers, and as would be consistent with the republican principles of our Government.

The honorable gentleman from Maryland says the question is, whether there is any process of law, however this provision be construed, by which we can effect the whole fee in lands. My answer is that no authority can be found in the Constitution by which we can effect a forfeiture of the whole fee in lands, and without some provision authorizing it, no lawyer can pretend that the plain provision of the Constitution, which declares that no attainer of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted, can be set aside by Congress by resorting to some other form of proceeding than conviction of the offender. That construction would violate the reason of the law and the intention of its makers; for, if Congress can pass a law confiscating the fee simple of the estate, they would have the same right to pass a law working corruption of blood, with all the pains and penalties attached to treason by the common law of England. Such could not have been the intention of the Convention which framed the Constitution.

At common law the punishment of treason was:

1. That the offender be drawn to the gallows, and not be carried or walk.
2. That he be hanged by the neck, and then cut down alive.
3. That his entrails be taken out and burned while he is yet alive.
4. That his head be cut off.
5. That his body be divided into four parts,
6. That his head and quarters be at the king's disposal.

He could not inherit lands, nor transmit them to his posterity.

If the gentleman's construction of the Constitution be correct, Congress could pass a law not only punishing the person of the traitor in all the ways known to the common law, but deprive him from inheriting from his ancestors or transmitting to his posterity.

Will the dispassionate members of this House sustain so gross and outrageous a violation of the Constitution and intentions of the illustrious dead who transmitted to us that great palladium of American liberty?

The honorable gentleman from Maryland says that the purpose assumed is the protection of the offspring from punishment, from the guilt of the ancestor. He says a fine is equally taken from the offspring as land yet no one denies the right to fine a person attainted. He says, without meaning to say positively, that that is the meaning and operation of the section. I say that, in my judgment, it comes nearer an intelligible exposition of it than any such theory as this—that you cannot take his lands in fee, but you may take all his personal property absolutely, which was the ground of the President's threatened veto last year; that you can fine a man to the extent of his estate, but you cannot take his lands to pay the fine; and being unintelligible, with all respect to our recent friends, they are driven to say that in the punishment of treason the Constitution has been guilty of this intolerable folly—that for robbing the mail, or piracy, for any ordinary offense, or murder on the seas, or in the Army or Navy; that for any ordinary crime Congress may prescribe what punishment they please, take the land in fee; but in providing for the punishment of treason, the greatest crime, the most dangerous crime, it has feebly attempted to protect innocent offspring by saving the lands of the convict, but leaving his life and all his personal property at the mercy of the law.

Congress cannot prescribe what punishment they please by fining the offender to the whole extent of his real and personal estate, corrupting his blood, cutting off his heirs, and depriving him from inheriting from his ancestors, because that would be in violation of the organic law, that no attainer of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted; for the object of the Constitution is not merely to prevent corruption of blood and forfeiture because he has been tried and convicted upon an indictment or otherwise, but it is the manifest intent of the makers of the organic law to limit the common-law punishment for treason, whether the party has been found guilty by criminal proceedings or otherwise.

By the common law of England attainer is a deprivation of power to inherit or transmit property, and in general a loss of all civil rights consequent on a sentence of death or outlawry for treason or felony. But in imitation of the wisdom of our fathers who framed our organic law upon this subject, England has moved with the spirit of the age; and in that country now, attainer, by a recent statute, is limited to the life of the person attainted.

Shall it be said that the people of England are more humane, just, and good than the descendants of Washington, Jackson, Madison, Monroe, and Jefferson?

The gentleman from Maryland says that there is no word in the law of the last Congress that attaches confiscation of property to conviction of the person for treason, to attainer of the person for treason on a criminal proceeding in any court of justice; so that if there be no proceeding by indictment, there can be no attainer; and if there be no attainer, there is nothing on which the residue of the words in the Constitution can operate.

In other words, he takes the ground that by an act of Congress or some other proceeding than by indictment, the traitor may not only be punished by all the modes of the common law, his blood corrupted, his children disinherited, and he be prevented from inheriting from his ancestors, because there is no criminal conviction of the offender required by the confiscation act.

The first section of the confiscation act, approved July 17, 1862, United States Statutes at Large, volume twelve, page 589, relates to the full crime of treason, and not its ingredients.

The seventh section describes the proceedings to secure condemnation.

The eighth section defines the power of the courts in such cases.

The joint resolution explanatory of that act, and which is proposed to be repealed, was approved the same day as the confiscation act. If the construction given to the Constitution by the gentleman from Maryland and those who agree with him be the true one, then the President was wrong in threatening to veto the confiscation bill because it did not limit the forfeiture of the real estate to the life of the offender, because, as the gentleman says, there is nothing in the confiscation act that attaches confiscation of property to the conviction of the person for treason.

The President well knew that such a construction as claimed by the gentleman would be in violation of the Constitution and the spirit of the organic law, and of the well-settled opinions of the jurists of the land, and therefore he refused to sign the bill, and would have vetoed it, had not the joint resolution explanatory of the act been passed, upon the ground of its violation of the Constitution. Before the joint resolution now proposed to be repealed was passed, the President prepared his message to veto the confiscation act, which will be found in the Congressional Globe, in which he said—

"That to which I chiefly object pervades most part of the act, but more distinctly appears in the first, second, and seventh and eighth sections."

"It is the sum of those provisions which results in the divesting of title forever."

"For the causes of treason and ingredients of treason not amounting to the full crime, it declares forfeiture extending beyond the lives of the guilty parties; whereas the Constitution of the United States declares that 'no attainer shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted.' True, there is to be no formal attainer in this case; still I think the greater punishment cannot be constitutionally inflicted in a different form for the same offense."

The President completely answers the argument of the gentleman when he says the greater punishment cannot be constitutionally inflicted in a different form than that prohibited by the Constitution.

The argument of the gentleman is answered by that great jurist, Judge Story, in 2 Story's Commentaries, section thirteen hundred, in which, after quoting the clause of the Constitution in question, he says:

"It really operates as a posthumous punishment upon them, and compels them to bear not only the disgrace naturally attendant upon such flagitious crimes, but takes from them the common rights and privileges enjoyed by all other citizens, where they are wholly innocent, and however remote they may be in the lineage from the first offender. It surely is enough for society to take the life of the offender, as a just punishment of his crime, without taking from his offspring and relatives that property which may be the only means of saving them from poverty and ruin. It is bad policy too; for it cuts off all the attachments which these unfortunate victims might otherwise feel for their own Government, and prepares them to engage in any other service by which their supposed injuries may be redressed or their hereditary hatred gratified. Upon these and similar grounds it may be presumed that the clause was first introduced into the original draft of the Constitution, and, after some amendments, it was adopted without any apparent resistance. By the laws since passed by Congress it is declared that no conviction or judgment for any capital or other offenses shall work corruption of blood or any forfeiture of estate. The history of other countries abundantly proves that one of the strong incentives to prosecute offenses, as treason, has been the chance of sharing in the plunder of the victims. Rapacity has been thus stimulated to exert itself in the service of the most corrupt tyranny; and tyranny has been thus furnished with new opportunities of indulging its malignity and revenge, of gratifying its envy of the rich and good, and of increasing its means to reward favorites, and secure retainers for the worst deeds."

It is also answered by James Madison, on page 173 of the Federalist, whose language I now quote:

"As treason may be committed against the United States, the authority of the United States ought to be able to punish it; but as new fangled and artificial treasons have been the great engines by which violent factions, the natural offspring of free governments, have usually wreaked their alternate malignity on each other, the Convention have, with great judgment, opposed a barrier to this peculiar danger by inserting a constitutional definition of the crime, fixing the proof necessary for conviction of it, and restraining the Congress even in punishing it from extending the consequences of guilt beyond the person of its author."

If this joint resolution giving the construction to the confiscation bill be repealed, it leaves the act no more nor less than a bill of pains and penalties, which, in the sense of the Constitution, is included in bills of attainder mentioned in the organic law.

Judge Story, in speaking of the clause of the Constitution which declares that no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed, (volume two, sections thirteen hundred and forty-three and thirteen hundred and forty-four), says:

"The next clause is, 'No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.'

"Bills of attainder, as they are technically called, are such special acts of the legislature as inflict capital punishments upon persons supposed to be guilty of high offenses, such as treason and felony, without any conviction in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. If an act inflicts a milder degree of punishment than death it is called a bill of pains and penalties. But in the sense of the Constitution it seems that bills of attainder include bills of pains and penalties; for the Supreme Court have said, 'A bill of attainder may affect the life of an individual or may confiscate his property, or both.' In such cases the legislature assumes judicial magistracy, pronouncing upon the guilt of the party without any of the common forms and guards of trial, and satisfying itself with proofs, when such proofs are within its reach, whether they are conformable to the rules of evidence or not. In short, in all such cases the legislature exercises the highest power of sovereignty, and what may be properly deemed an irresponsible despotic discretion, being governed solely by what it deems political necessity or expediency, and too often under the influence of unreasonable fears or unfounded suspicions. Such acts have been often resorted to in foreign Governments, as a common engine of state; and even in England they have been pushed to the most extravagant extent in bad times, reaching as well to the absent and the dead as to the living. Sir Edward Coke has mentioned it to be among the transcendent powers of Parliament that an act may be passed to attain a man after he is dead. And the reigning monarch, who was slain at Bosworth, is said to have been attainted by an act of Parliament a few months after his death, notwithstanding the absurdity of deeming him at once in possession of the throne and a traitor. The punishment has often been inflicted without calling upon the party accused to answer, or without even the formality of proof, and sometimes because the law, in its ordinary course of proceedings, would acquit the offender. The injustice and iniquity of such acts, in general, constitute an irresistible argument against the existence of the power. In a free Government it would be intolerable; and in the hands of a reigning faction it might be, and probably would be, abused to the ruin and death of the most virtuous citizens. Bills of this sort have been most usually passed in England in times of rebellion, or of gross subservience to the Crown, or of violent political excitements; periods in which all nations are most liable (as well the free as the enslaved) to forget their duties, and to trample upon the rights and liberties of others."

Dr. Paley has strongly shown his disapprobation of laws of this sort. I quote from him a short but pregnant passage:

"This fundamental rule of civil jurisprudence is violated in the case of acts of attainder or confiscation, in bills of pains and penalties, and in all ex post facto laws whatever, in which Parliament exercises the double office of legislature and judge. And whoever either understands the value of the rule itself, or collects the history of those instances in which it has been invaded, will be induced, I believe, to acknowledge that it had been wiser and safer never to have departed from it."

Section nine of article one of the Constitution, which declares that "no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed," was inserted therein before section three of the third article, which prevents attainder of treason from working corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted. If the construction of the gentleman from Maryland be correct that there must be an attainder before the words "but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted" can operate, then the clause last quoted has no effect or force, and is mere surplusage. Because if the object of the Constitution was to prevent the forfeiture of the estate during life only, and only in the case of an attainder of treason, then the words "no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed" would have been sufficient, because if there was no attainder there could be no forfeiture; and as the passing of a bill of attainder is expressly prohibited, it is clear evidence that the subsequent clause of the Constitution was not simply intended to apply to attainder of treason, but was intended to prevent, by act of Congress, as well as by indictment and conviction, the forfeiture of the estate for a longer time than the life of the offender. What other object could have been contemplated by the lawmakers? Did they place this limit to forfeiture in the Constitution to answer some purpose not obtained by the other clause in reference to a bill of attainder? If so, no rational construction can be given to the Constitution but that which prevents all power from forfeiting the estate beyond the life of the offender; and as the Constitution expressly limits the forfeiture for treason at common law, there can be no act of Congress making the forfeiture of land longer than the life of the offender, because the Constitution gives no such power.

If the framers of the organic laws had intended that in some other manner than by attainder or indictment the blood could be corrupted, or the estate forfeited forever, they would have made provision in the Constitution to meet the case by granting the right to Congress or some other authority. But the learned and honorable gentleman from Maryland says he takes it that the meaning of the clause is that the forfeiture worked should, must, be effected during life; and consequently, if it be effected during life, it forfeits the fee simple. What better are the children off if the estate be forfeited before the death of the father? If the forfeiture be absolute, they would be no more injured by depriving them of the benefit of the estate by forfeiture after than before death.

If the construction of the gentleman be correct, then the offender if proceeded against for treason in his lifetime would have his blood corrupted upon the same reasoning that he would have the fee simple of his lands forfeited, in which case he would be prevented from inheriting from his ancestors or transmitting to his posterity other real estate than that confiscated and wherever situated; therefore he would constitute a bar to his posterity inheriting through him the property of their grandfather or more remote ancestors; because, although he was dead, the only way the heir could inherit the lands of his grandfather or more remote ancestor would be through the blood of his father, which had been corrupted, and consequently no one could trace descent through him. Can it be that the framers of this organic law ever intended to give such power to Congress or any other body that would, if the power were exercised, punish the children for the crime of the father? Can it be said that in this boasted land of liberty and humanity our Constitution recognizes the power of this Government to destroy and blot out forever the inheritable right of millions of children, and cut off the dower of thousands of mothers, and transmit us back to the darkest days of ancient barbarism, cruelty, and passion?

A revengeful and indiscriminate plunder of the means of support for the weak, the unprotected, and the helpless, cannot command the respect of a Christian God. Such a construction of the Constitution as claimed by the gentleman is repugnant to a republican government. It would violate the spirit of a Christian age. It would break down and destroy the social relations. It would deprive the helpless orphan and the widowed mother of their inherent right by the laws of God and the wisdom of man to that protection which the good order of society demands. It would degrade us as a nation before the civilization of the world. It would be more in accordance with the despotic usages of Russia or Turkey than the republican philanthropy of the American people. It would blot out the great memories of the Revolution. It would sever the ties of a holy religious brotherhood. It would be against the best interests of true freedom and humanity. Such a construction is founded in sectional passion and a determination to break down the organic law. It is calculated to destroy all kindly relations between the true Union men of the South, who are forced into the army by conscription and draft and compelled to sustain the rebellion by the tyranny of power, and the people of the North, and adds to the fires of sectional discord and strife which are now ending in battles of blood. Its true theories are laid down in Helper's Impending Crisis, and are attempted to and will be carried into effect, unless prevented by the conservative Republicans of this House, by the radical abolitionists, who regard nothing but the negro, against the opinion of the President, both Houses of the last Congress, and the plain provisions of the Constitution. It will unhinge the prosperity of a century by confiscating and forfeiting forever the landed estates of eight million people and subjecting the women and children of the South to a tyranny as base as that of England toward Ireland when she confiscated the whole landed estates of that downtrodden and oppressed people. This attempted legislation is no more nor less than an attempt to carry out the plans of Helper by driving from the southern soil the women and children of that land and filling their places with the plunderers of the Government and the free and slave negroes of the land. God stay the hand of such philanthropy.

But, says the gentleman, the grounds of the President's threatened veto of the confiscation bill were that you could not take the land in fee, but you could take all his personal property absolutely. The reason for that is very plain. Personal property is of a fluctuating, transitory, and perishable nature. Real estate is of a permanent, settled, and local nature. Personal property deteriorates, perishes; it may be consumed by fire or removed by flood. Much of it has life; it dies and is gone. It is of a movable nature, and can be carried from place to place. Real estate remains; it cannot be consumed; it lasts during all time. The heir can enjoy it. The forfeiture of personal property was not confined to life, because it is incompatible with a life estate; and in all probability if confiscated for life would be used up or gone before the offender was dead. These are the reasons why personal estate was forfeited absolutely. Our fathers intended to protect the innocent offspring as far as they could consistent with the nature of the property forfeited.

But the gentleman says that for robbing the mail or piracy, for any ordinary offense, or murder on the seas or in the Army or Navy; that for any ordinary crime Congress may prescribe what punishment they please; take the land in fee. Congress can do no such thing, because our fathers, fearing after they had made the Constitution that wicked and vicious men, under the plea of military necessity, might act the part of a tyrannical despotism under the forms of law, had added to the Constitution a bill of rights, one of which is contained in article eight of the amendments, which declares that "Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted."

That article prevents the fining of a person to the full amount of all his real and personal estate, if he have much, and thereby depriving the heirs of all the real estate of the father, because such a fine would be an excessive fine within the meaning of the Constitution.

Would it not be excessive, cruel, and unusual to fine a man worth his millions as much as he is worth, and, to pay the fine, sell thousands or hundreds of acres of his lands? It would be unusual, because excessive fines have not been inflicted in this country, as they punish the innocent as well as the guilty. Congress cannot punish the father at the expense of the mother and innocent children, by forfeiting forever the real estate of the offender, because it would be, within the meaning of the amendment, an unusual punishment.

But another gentleman says the object is not to make the forfeiture of the fee simple, but to leave it to the courts. If the opinions of the learned jurists Judges Story and Curtis and the well-settled and understood language of the Constitution are regarded as law, why annul or amend the joint resolution, which has the condition that no punishment or proceeding under said act shall be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life? If it be constitutional law that no punishment or proceedings can work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life why ask to have the joint resolution repealed, amended, or altered?

I appeal to conservative members on the other side of the House, if any there be, whether they can doubt the unconstitutionality of an act of Congress which attempts or recognizes the principle that the real estate of the offender, in the case of treason, can be forfeited longer than his natural life, when they have the plain and emphatic language of their President, Abraham Lincoln, that he was opposed to and should veto the confiscation bill upon the grounds that the provisions of the act resulted in the divesting of title forever; and because for the cause of treason and ingredients of treason not amounting to the full crime it declared forfeiture extending beyond the lives of the guilty parties; and because the Constitution of the United States declares that "no attainer shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted;" and because the greater punishment cannot be inflicted in a different form for the same offense; and when the Republicans and abolitionists (because I think there is a distinction between the two) in that House and Senate which passed the joint resolution in question were largely in the majority, having in the Senate and House only a small band of patriots to contend with.

What has come over the dreams of the philanthropists of this House, that they should now attempt to set aside that joint resolution which was passed by their own party a little over a year ago and approved by their President, in which they declared that no punishment or proceedings under the confiscation act should be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life? Were the President and Congress then right in their construction of the Constitution? Is there any reason that this House should change the well-settled construction of the Constitution, given to it by the learned jurists of this country, the President of the United States, and both Houses of Congress who voted for it; or has it become a military necessity in order to subjugate and exterminate the women and children of the South, that we should make new penalties overriding the Constitution?

If the settled rules of law in construing constitutions and laws be adhered to, there can be no question in the mind of any unprejudiced man that any law which attempts to forfeit the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life is unconstitutional.

In construing the Constitution, the plain and understood acceptance of words must be used. We must construe it as it reads; understanding the words in their ordinary and known acceptance. No subtle nicety or technical jargon is to be resorted to to break down great constitutional rights. In construing the clauses of the Constitution which bear upon this subject we are to look for the reasons which induced our fathers to make them.

What was the common law before the making of the Constitution upon this subject; and what mischief of the common law was intended to be remedied by it? The punishment of the traitor at common law was that, in certain defined ways, his life should be taken. He was subject to attainder which corrupted his blood and forfeited his estate forever, real and personal, so that he could not inherit from his ancestors nor transmit to his posterity.

The reasons why the punishment for treason is limited to the life estate, and why, for a lesser crime, the fee may sometimes be sold, are grounded in the uncertain character of treason as illustrated in British history, one dynasty succeeding another so rapidly, and there was such a confusion even among men of honest intention as to the rights of sovereignty, that even a good man might mistake in his judgment, or a timid man be forced in spite of his judgment by the ruling power, even where the power was not the rightful sovereign.

Hence the framers of the Constitution determined that in this country the scenes of confiscation should not be enacted which had made England a hissing reproach. They determined that political or partisan adhesion to the present rule should not receive the lasting punishment which would perpetuate its effects upon the rising generation.

Another reason is that treason is a political crime; and no civilized nation, by treaty or otherwise, ever agrees to or does give up to the nation against which the crime is committed, the party who committed the treason; hence since the first dawnings of civilization it has been the settled right of the traitor to seek protection in some other country, as is now practiced by the traitors of the South in England, France, and Canada, in proof of which it is only necessary to refer to the case of Mason and Slidell, who were taken upon the high seas from a British ship, and for which England threatened war, and we were compelled to deliver them up to the English authorities; but in the case of murder or piracy or forgery, or other high crimes, offenders are given up by one country to another, and treaties are made between many nations for such purposes.

These reasons why the forfeiture was limited to life do not belong to other crimes, which are malæ in se; therefore the fee may be sold for these crimes, but not for crimes whose punishment too often depends on party ascendancy or malice.

Another reason is that our revolutionary fathers waged a bloody war against Great Britain for over seven years for the purpose of establishing upon this continent a republican government; and they, knowing that they had just gone through a war in which, if they had failed, they would have been subjected to all the pains and penalties of treason at common law, deemed such punishment as provided for at common law anti-republican and inhuman, that the innocent babe, the unborn offspring, the orphan boy, the helpless daughter, and the widowed mother should suffer for the crime of the father and husband, inserted into the Constitution that wise provision which prohibits the forfeiture of the real estate beyond the life of the offender.

That principle of the common law which visited the sins of the father upon the child and the mother was shocking to the finer feelings of the Anglo-American race, struck down the true principles of Christianity, punished the harmless daughter and the upright son for the transgressions of their father, whose action they were unable to control.

Our fathers who reared this grand and magnificent structure of the old Union viewed that doctrine of the common law, as they did that principle of it which gave all the lands of the intestate to the oldest son, as wrong and unfair; and while they had no design of screening the traitor they determined to protect his innocent offspring and his helpless wife; and in order to protect the innocent they declared that no attainer of treason should work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted; and for fear that an attainer might be passed after the death of the traitor to take away the real estate from the widow and children, they declared that no bill of attainder or ex post facto law should be passed.

This last clause of the Constitution was adopted by the Convention without any apparent opposition, because at that time the principles of Christianity and charity prevailed, and that sacred instrument was not considered by our fathers a covenant with death and a league with hell; and because that instrument was the fountain where all the love, patriotism, and valor of those who died for their country, and of those who fought and lived for its liberties, were consecrated and cemented through the merits of that Constitution, to be transmitted to the descendants of our revolutionary fathers.

The only object to be attained by a law which takes the estate from the widow and the children forever, would be to punish the innocent, and allow the speculator, the robber, and the thief to fatten upon the miseries and misfortunes of plundered victims of a tyrannical, anti-republican, and despotic law. I am also opposed to repealing or altering the law as it now stands, upon grounds of humanity, charity, and policy. I want to see this Union restored. I want the Union that our fathers made. I want that Union which gave us peace, prosperity, happiness, greatness, and grandeur, such as no other people ever before enjoyed; because it is that Union which will secure to the people of this country and those who were born in foreign lands but who came here because they were told it was the land of the free and the home of the brave, those guarantees which are contained in our organic law. How is that peace to be obtained? It cannot be obtained by cruel, unusual, unconstitutional, and unjust punishments. If we exercise toward those in rebellion who are under the control of the minions of power at the South the principles of conciliation and charity, in the spirit by which the foundations of our liberties were laid, broad, strong, and deep in the beginning, and show to them and the world that we are prosecuting this war and passing our laws with the view of restoring the Union, and not for the purpose of oppressing the people of the South, and not in a spirit of revenge or passion, and with the view of punishing those only who are voluntarily attempting to destroy the unity of the Government, and not their innocent children and unaccountable widows, we will soon see the sun of liberty set all over this land, and the glorious and hallowed heritages which our fathers bequeathed to us restored and maintained.

In the South are hundreds of thousands of loyal hearts, men and women who dare not sustain the Union of the States because they are controlled by a wicked and reckless despotism—where the act of sustaining the Union would be deemed by the minions in power an act of disloyalty to the so-called southern confederacy, and would subject them to the pains of death or imprisonment. Thousands are forced into the rebel army by conscription and draft which they dare not and could not successfully resist.

Do the members of this honorable body feel willing to make the penalty due the vilest traitor be borne by the forced conscript, whose heart is for the Union, but whose involuntary and forced act identifies him with the rebellion?

The law, as it now stands, forfeits the estate of the forced conscript for life. Is that not sufficient; or do you not only want to punish the innocent conscript, but his children after him, because their father was so unfortunate as to be forced to do military duty against a Government he loved? I hold that no Government has a right to demand the support of those whom it cannot protect.

If confiscation bills must be passed punishing the innocent and guilty parents by a confiscation of their estates for life, let us, in the name of Him who knows the destiny of us all, save as far as we can the mother and her babe, and cease the infliction of tyranny and despotism upon the spirit of this enlightened age.

Do not let us corrupt the blood of the pure, or rob the innocent of that which may keep the virgin chaste; the widow and the mother happy, the children respected, the poor-houses unfilled, and the rising and unborn generations of one portion of our common country from having the means to sustain life and educate themselves grasped from their control. Remember that we are not only making a precedent for ourselves, but for our children and descendants who are to come after us, and that our action upon this bill may settle the future destiny and happiness of millions of human beings in this land; because if Congress deem it prudent and constitutional to forfeit estates forever, they throw, if we succeed in this contest, (which I hope in the name of God we may,) upon the cold charities of the world millions of the innocent descendants of our revolutionary sires.

I charge that the object of repealing the explanatory resolution is to fill the coffers of the wicked, reckless, and cowardly speculator and plunderer, who, regardless of the weeping mother, orphan children, helpless and unprotected widows, mourning sisters, aged and decrepit fathers, would eat out and destroy the substance of the nation and trample upon the rights and liberties of a bleeding and desecrated country, upon the pretext of legal forms as a license for them to exercise their depraved and avaricious natures.

Sir, I hope the gentlemen upon the other side will stop and consider before they vote away one of the great doctrines of Christianity and constitutional law. I hope the conservative element of this House on both sides will rise to the dignity of freemen, and not allow party passion and party action to override the barriers of the Constitution; because it is a duty which we owe to the sacred memory of our revolutionary fathers, to the women and children of this land, to our homes and to our property, to stand firmly by our oaths of office and the organic law of the land. Do not let the American name and the glorious old flag of the Union be disgraced by having our descendants to read in the history of this country that the Thirty-Eighth Congress were so lost to all sense of humanity and Christianity as to even by implication desire that our organic law should be so construed, by a corrupt and dependent judge, as to allow a forfeiture of the real estate of the father to extend beyond his life, and thereby cut off the lineal heirs and the widowed mother.

If this resolution explanatory of the confiscation bill should be repealed it would look as though the days of ancient barbarism were thundering down the gates of liberty. If the construction given by the gentleman from Maryland is to prevail, then I pity the mighty fall and dreadful doom which await the women and children of a large portion of this land; as I have witnessed in silent sorrow one by one of the barriers of the Constitution rent asunder and broken down, and the rights and liberties of the people trampled under foot in violation of the organic law of the land. I do not utter these words in the feeling of party spirit. I do not intend to throw anything in the way of this Administration to prevent a constitutional prosecution of this war. I intend to stand by the country and the noble and gallant officers and soldiers in the field, and to vote for men and money to an unlimited extent to put down this rebellion; but at the same time I am for adding to war and force the power of conciliation, Christianity, charity, and compromise, so far as is consistent with an honorable and lasting peace, based solely and alone upon the unity of all the States and the restoration of the old Union, and to consent to no peace until every star attempted to be struck from our glorious banner shall be cemented to its sacred folds.

But, sir, when we oppose any measure coming from the other side of this House, because we believe it unconstitutional or unwise, we are charged with disloyalty; and the gentleman from Maryland went so far, in discussing this resolution, as to say:

"When they tender support I shall look at it with something of suspicion. For myself, sir, relying on the fact that the people have sent enough of us here for the purpose of supporting the Administration, I would suggest that perhaps gentlemen on the other side of the House had just as well execute the mission with which the constituents that elected them sent them here, charged to oppose, to embarrass, to libel, and to break down the Administration, and leave the support of it to the gentlemen whom the people have sent here to maintain it."

I need not say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we did not come here for the purpose of libeling or breaking down the Administration. That was not the object for which our constituents sent us here. They sent us here because they found that after this war had gone on for two long years, and they had sent forth their sons and brothers, whose blood had reddened every battle-field; they only received from their opponents epithets and disapprobation; they sent us here because they believed that an attempt was being made to deprive them of the fruits of the Constitution and of the constitutional liberties which had been delegated to them by their fathers, and they went to the ballot-box in New Jersey and in other States to sustain, to perpetuate, to uphold, and to maintain those liberties, not with cannon-balls, but with ballots. They sent us here as their representatives because they believed that if the tide of abolitionism, fanaticism, of despotism, of ostracism, tyranny, banishment, and bondage was not stopped in its mad career, the liberties of the country would be blotted out and destroyed forever. They sent us here because they found that common informers were going about the land, and that drum-head courts-martial had usurped the forum of civil law. They sent us here to sustain the Administration in every constitutional measure to put down the rebellion. I was elected on such a platform, and by the God of heaven who made me I will stand on that platform though earth and hell confront me. They sent us here because they believed that our political enemies were exulting over the downfall of liberties made venerable by the love of centuries and laughing over each successive blow struck at public liberty and public law. They sent us here because they believed the party in power were reveling in the crisis of the nation's ruin; that their conduct was symbolic of the blood of Cato and Scipio, speaking in the swollen lineaments of ancient barbarism; that the heroic honor of truth and the ancient days of justice were dead and gone; that the passions of four political enemies had entered our households, poisoned the affections and destroyed the intercourse of men; because they believed that the ostracism of ancient Greece and the deportations of modern Russia had been openly carried into effect; because they believed that no sense of the mighty fall or shadow of the dreadful doom which then appeared to await the people of the land had stopped the reckless clouds of despotism and tyranny that then appeared to hover over us in that hour of frantic revelry; because they believed the doctrine of the rebels of the South and the fanatics of the North had proven itself antagonistic to true freedom and humanity; because they believed the proclamation for the abolition of slavery, which had been lately made, had disturbed and embittered the social dependencies, broken the bonds of a common political faith, degraded us as a nation before the envious monarchs of earth, deprived us of our inherent power to vindicate our rights, and sowed broadcast throughout the land the terrible seeds of disunion, by which the people would reap a harvest of death, desolation, misery, mourning, and woe unparalleled in the history of the world; because they believed that the spirit of abolition had breathed its contagion throughout the national capital, had profaned and polluted its very walls; that it had defiled the holy places of this country by its corrupting influences; that foul abolitionism was croaking for prey and wetting its bloody beaks and dirty talons upon the sacred altars of the nation; and because the proud spirit of the people, whose principles were founded in the spirit of Washington and Jefferson, had been degraded by practices that were disgraceful to the civilized world.

The gentleman from Illinois said we on this side of the House did not represent any constituency, and that if we had been dealt with according to the Constitution we would not have been here. I want those gentlemen to understand that some of us do represent a constituency, even by the vote of the last fall's election.

There is a little State in this Union that lies between the great States of New York and Pennsylvania called New Jersey. It is the State that did not give her electoral or popular vote to this Administration. It is the State where no draft has taken place, and was the first to place her entire quota of "three months' men" in the field, fully armed and equipped, after President Lincoln, on the 15th of April, 1861, had summoned the loyal States to the succor and defense of the Union. She was the first to procure her full complement of men under the subsequent call for three hundred thousand additional troops. Of the "nine months' men" she furnished her appropriate contingent; and at the last call of the Government she raised by volunteering more men than were obtained from the whole of New England by the draft. It is the State that last fall, for the second time, rolled back that tide of abolitionism and fanaticism which was sweeping around her borders. It is the State that gave more majority for the Democratic party and the Union last fall, according to the vote polled; than it did in 1862. It is the State that never has and never will give her vote to the ruinous policy of fanaticism, abolitionism, despotism, ostracism, tyranny, banishment, or bondage. It is the State that sends her Representatives here by the power of ballots, instead of bayonets, cannon, and bullets. It is that State which in the contest now raging poured out her men and money in streams as mighty as the waters which sweep from her mountain sides, whose sons have laid down their lives around the sacred precinct of the tomb of Washington to uphold and perpetuate the blessings of liberty bequeathed to us by the framers of the Constitution, which men who love the negro better than their country are trying by this legislation to destroy. It is the State that has not forgotten the battles of Monmouth, Princeton, and Trenton. It is the gallant, noble State that never falters in her devotion to the Union. In fact, sir, it is the only State that stands by the Constitution and Union of our fathers.

Why should we be charged with disloyalty when the blood of the Democratic sons and fathers has reddened the soil upon every battle-field? The charge is base and cowardly, and only worthy of fanatics, panderers, and parasites to despotic power. The gentlemen who make such charges might as well understand that we do not intend to be intimidated by any such cowardly and dastardly insults, as we consider those who make such charges beneath the dignity and consideration of freemen. I, for one, do not intend to allow the Constitution to be subverted and the liberties of the people trampled under foot by any unconstitutional or abnormal legislation without at least protesting against it; because, sir, the Constitution is the Union, and if it be destroyed, the Union perishes with it. I mean the Union that our fathers made. It is that Union, and that alone, which can give to the people of this country those safeguards which all men claim as the jewels of their most precious birthright.

Mr. SPALDING obtained the floor.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 143) to amend the law prescribing the articles to be admitted into the mails of the United States; when the Speaker signed the same.

EXCUSED FROM SERVING UPON A COMMITTEE.

Mr. LOAN. I rise for the purpose of asking to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Military Affairs.

No objection was made, and Mr. LOAN was excused.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. STEVENS. With the leave of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] who is entitled to the floor, I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the sixth section of the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to offer an amendment to a previous section of the bill. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] yesterday offered an amendment in relation to the tax imposed upon cotton. I desire to know if that amendment was agreed to?

The CHAIRMAN. It was adopted.

Mr. PENDLETON. In order to perfect that section and to make the principle which has been adopted by the House apply to all goods subject to taxation, I propose to offer an amendment in shape of a proviso, and I will state to the House that it proposes to repeal so much of the original tax law as provided that cotton in the hands of the manufacturer on the 1st day of October, 1862, should not pay a tax. I am not aware that there is any cotton of that kind in the hands of the manufacturers, but if there is, in order to carry out the principle adopted by the House yesterday, I move to add at the end of the fourth section the following proviso:

And provided further, That all provisions of law whereby cotton in the hands of manufacturers of cotton fabrics on October 1, 1862, and prior thereto, is exempted from taxation are hereby repealed, and the same shall be subject to the rate of taxation imposed by this bill.

The object of the amendment is to repeal an exemption contained in the original tax law whereby cotton in the hands of the cotton manufacturer on the 1st day of October, 1862, was exempted from taxation. I will say that I do not approve the principle which was adopted in the committee yesterday, but members seem determined to carry it out. They did so in the case of distilled spirits. They did it again in the case of cotton, imposing a tax on the stock in hand. I want to have that principle carried out still further, by providing that all the cotton in the hands of manufacturers on the 1st of October, 1862, as well as all other cotton, shall be subject to the duty imposed by this act. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine, adopted yesterday, only provides that cotton which has paid the duty of half a cent per pound shall now pay the additional tax of a cent and a half. This amendment of mine proposes to tax two cents that cotton which under the former law was entirely exempted from taxation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to strike out of the sixth section the following words:

A drawback of two cents per pound upon such articles in all cases where the duty imposed by this act upon the cotton used in the manufacture thereof shall be satisfactorily shown to have been previously paid; the amount of said drawback to be ascertained in such manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

In proposing this amendment permit me to say that the Committee of Ways and Means in reporting this bill has committed, I think, an oversight. The bill purports to be a revenue bill; but this section gives a bounty of two cents per pound to the manufacturers of cotton, and therefore the bill ought to be called a bill for their benefit, and not a revenue bill. I suppose it will be replied to me that it is necessary to allow the drawback of this duty on cotton manufactures exported, in order to enable manufacturers to compete in the foreign markets with foreign manufacturers. My reply to that is that the manufacturers of France, England, and Germany pay the same two cents a pound on the raw cotton; and therefore the American and foreign manufacturers will go into competition in the foreign markets on equal terms. Besides, as the cottons of Egypt, Sarat, and Brazil are often mixed up with American cotton, there would be much difficulty in ascertaining the component parts of the manufactured goods, so that the manufacturer would often have the drawback allowed on cotton for which he had paid no duty.

I think, besides, that the principle is unjust. We have imposed a tax of sixty cents per gallon on whisky, and it falls not upon the distillers of spirits but on the producers of grain in the great Northwest. The able memorial from Chicago, exceedingly well got up, which has been read and re-read on this floor, shows that were it not for the consumption of corn in spirits, the price of corn would be from forty to sixty cents per bushel lower than it now is. It shows that it is the conversion of corn and other grain into whisky that increases the price of corn from forty to sixty cents. Here is a heavy tax on the great agricultural interest of the country, and a bounty to the manufacturing interest of the country. As a man representing commercial interests I stand between, and I ask equal and exact justice both to the agriculturist and to the manufacturer. I therefore propose to have this drawback on exported goods struck out of the bill, as being out of place in a revenue bill and as inconsistent with all the other items.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand that the gentleman's amendment only strikes out all after the word "articles?"

Mr. BROOKS. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. There seems to be no reason for leaving the rest of the section in. The preceding portion of the section would be without any meaning whatever. I therefore move to amend the amendment by striking out the first part of the section, as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the date on which this act takes effect, in computing the allowance or drawback upon articles manufactured exclusively of cotton when exported, there shall be allowed, in addition to the three per cent. duty which shall have been paid on such articles; and to insert in lieu of the whole section a substitute for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the pending amendment should first be acted on.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well, sir; I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] manifests his friendship for commerce in a very singular way. It is true that a little foreign commerce has sprung up in the country in consequence of our manufacturers being able, from a long staple of cotton, to manufacture goods and send them to India, China, South America, and Mexico. Unless the drawback were allowed them they could not compete at all with English or other foreign manufacturers, and would be effectively shut out of foreign markets. The law of drawbacks is specially guarded, requiring the parties to make satisfactory proof in all cases that the duty has been paid. Unless it has been paid it will not be returned. Besides, the drawback is only to be allowed to them on the weight of the cotton after being manufactured, and they will lose on account of the shrinkage which cotton undergoes in the process of manufacture. It is no loss to the Government at all to allow these drawbacks. But if the gentleman from New York is disposed to entirely extinguish this kind of trade, and if the House choose to follow him in it, then be it so.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York by striking out the entire section; and I do it for the reason that I regard the principle of the whole section as pernicious and wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that his proposition is not an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will then speak in support of the amendment of the gentleman from New York, which embraces substantially the subject upon which I wish to speak, although it does not go as far as I think it ought.

Let us arrest our attention for a moment by looking into the legislation that exists at this time upon the subject of cotton and its manufacture. Provision is made in this section for a drawback of two cents per pound; and that system has existed and been followed in all our revenue laws since the present party came into power. The object of it is this: the manufactured article that is sold in this country pays a tax to the Government, but the manufacturer obtains a drawback to exactly the amount of that tax by charging up the price to the consumer.

You tax the manufacturer in the first place three per cent., but he sends the goods to the agricultural portion of the country and charges up the amount of the tax, and it comes back into his pocket. And in that way he pays no tax at all. And again, the little that is exported to foreign countries for sale is made free of tax in this way: when he has paid nominally the three per cent. and the goods reach the custom-house for exportation, the Government refunds the tax and pays the money back to him. Thus he is protected wherever he may sell in securing the return of the tax.

Sir, I defy any advocate of the manufacturing interest in this House to show me that the manufacturer, from shoe-peggs to broadcloths, pays one cent of revenue into the public Treasury that stays there. I have looked into this legislation so carefully that I am prepared to assert that no besieged city was ever so fortified against the possibility of attack as is the manufacturing interest of this country against being compelled to pay into the public Treasury one dollar of its wealth. Every dollar comes from the laboring, the agricultural, and the consuming portion of the country.

I want to know whether the West has any friends upon the floor of this House? We pay every dollar that is to be levied by this tax bill.

It is true, upon the question of this drawback that we are not directly interested; but it is also true that we will have to pay into the Treasury the amount which the Government refunds to these manufacturers. It is just so much taken out of the Treasury which we will have to replace. The manufacturing interest is protected in the trade at home by the additional import duty you have laid on foreign articles to the extent and more of the internal tax which you impose, and then, when the manufacturer sends his goods abroad, he is protected against the possibility of paying any tax by the Government refunding in the shape of a drawback all the taxes he has paid on the article to be exported.

Now this House might as well come to the conclusion that nobody is deceived by this kind of legislation. Gentlemen may as well lay aside the delusion they have sought to impose upon the country, that they are taxing these manufacturers.

Here you are imposing a tax of two cents a pound upon raw cotton. Who pays that tax? Not the manufacturer. The consumer pays it on what is sold in this country. On that which is to go abroad nobody pays, for the Government refunds it.

I repeat the assertion, and I challenge contradiction, that in this hour of the nation's trial and sorest necessity the manufacturing interest of the country pays not a dollar into the public Treasury that stays there. And yet airs of patriotism are put on here by men representing that interest. I visited New England last summer, and with pride and pleasure did I behold her beautiful valleys, her bright hills, her clear waters, the kind and hospitable people with whom I associated; but when I heard the swelling hum of her manufactories, and saw those which only a short time ago worked but a few hands now working their thousands, and rolling up their countless wealth, I felt that it was an unhealthy prosperity. To my mind it presented a wealth wrung from the labor, the sinews, the bone and muscle of the men who till the soil, taxed to an illegitimate extent to foster and support that great system of local wealth.

Mr. Chairman, I rejoice in the prosperity of the country, and the whole country. I love this country and every part of it, but I have no sectional animosities to gratify. I do not intend to stand idly by and see one portion of the country robbed and oppressed for the benefit of another. I will never vote for any revenue bill that embraces that principle. It is robbery; it is wrong.

If the manufacturers of this country cannot compete with the manufacturers of foreign countries, let them give up the business, and let us buy goods where we can buy them the cheapest. That is an honest principle, and none other is honest.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of enabling me to debate the act under the five-minute rule of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I understand the sixth section of this act to exempt manufacturers of raw cotton from the payment of taxes, or, in other words, to refund to them three per cent. as well as two cents per pound on all manufactured cotton they see fit to export. To that I am opposed. I represent a constituency whose pursuits are agricultural—a constituency who are consumers of the fabrics which are contemplated by the sixth section. I regard that section as discriminating not only in favor of the manufacturing interests of New England but in favor of the carrying trade of New England and New York at the expense of the Northwest. I am at a loss to know why the taxes upon cotton exported to the inhabitants of England and France should be taken off as drawback, and imposed upon the citizens of the Northwest. Such legislation is a discrimination, sir, that has caused much uneasiness in the Northwest; and this act is not the only discrimination against the interests of the Northwest at this session. Yesterday was adopted another discrimination against the Northwest in the shape of additional tax upon distilled spirits. I will not say that a tax of that kind would alienate the people of the Northwest; but I will say this much, that it will cause uneasiness and disquiet among those who are to pay this tax as consumers.

The effect of the sixth section is substantially this: if the manufacturer East, with millions, shall see fit to export this cotton when worked up into fabrics to Europe or elsewhere, it provides that he shall receive all of the profits without any burden of taxes. Gentlemen may say that it is necessary for the carrying trade of the Atlantic seaboard. It seems to me, in these times of heavy taxation under which the people, though they patiently bear it, are groaning, that it is unjust to favor a few cities upon the seaboard, who have bottoms for carrying exports, at the expense of the agricultural interests of the regions of the West who are furnishing, as they have furnished, men for the armies, and means for sustaining the armies, of the United States. Why should the manufacturer who accumulates cotton for the purpose of exportation if he can make more upon it; why, sir, should he be exempted from the payment of taxation, while we of the Northwest must submit as consumers to this taxation? There is no just reason for it.

Mr. WILSON. I represent a district of the Northwest, and I should like to ask the gentleman a question: whether, in his opinion, there are any consumers in the eastern and middle States?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I will answer the gentleman. The consumers in the middle and the eastern States are the laboring portion of the community, and they must bear the burdens which the speculators place upon them. But they have some compensation, for they may be employed to whirl the spindles of the New England factories, while the men of the Northwest must guide the plowshare, feed their stock, and consume the fabrics of New England.

Gentlemen may say that it is necessary to increase our exchanges with the rest of the world. Everybody knows that the competition between the United States and other countries in reference to cotton goods amounts to nothing. It will not amount to one dollar of increase of exchange because of this taxation, for England will take our cotton whether two cents per pound and three per cent. of tax ad valorem is imposed upon it or not. She cannot refuse, and the Northwest knows that very well. It is a discrimination in favor of New England manufactures at the expense of the agricultural portion of the country. Although we have not resisted the dictations of New England yet we protest against them. I protest against it on behalf of my constituents. I believe that you may so frame this measure as not to derive any taxation from the Northwest; that you may so oppress them in time that the objects of revenue may be defeated; but if that time comes, the oppression of speculative New England and the Atlantic seaboard will alienate the affections of that important portion of our Republic. We have furnished soldiers and generals who have won your and our victories and given an honorable fame to the arms of the Republic, and I hope will do so. Do not, then, treat us as hewers of wood and drawers of water for millionaires and speculators of the Atlantic seaboard. We have no heavy Army contracts or ill-gotten gains out of which to contribute, but every cent paid is the fruit of rural industry. Then at least regulate our burdens equally with the speculator and the shoddy contractor of New England. This we think is a moderate request.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

NEW SERIES.....No. 20.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, when it becomes necessary for me, in order to maintain my position in this House and to secure support at home, to encourage any kind of jealousy between one part of the country and another, then I shall consider it my duty to resign. [Cries of "Good!"] I happen to represent an agricultural State as much as any of the Northwest. I say that agriculturists are not at all charged, either in this or in any other bill, with internal taxation. They are not touched directly or remotely. They are as consumers taxed the same as any other consumers of the country, and no more. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] had been truly informed of the facts upon the subject, I presume that he would not have given utterance to some of the statements which he made. Manufacturers have not in all cases been able to increase their prices in proportion to the tax. In many instances it is far otherwise.

But I say to him and to the House, if it had not been for the inflation of the currency, many of the manufacturers of this country would at this moment have been utterly prostrated. I suppose it would be wise for this House to encourage exports to the utmost extent of our ability. I believe the people of this country are now indulging in very extravagant habits in relation to the consumption of our own manufactures and those from abroad. I believe, also, it is for the interest of the Union that we should keep those men who are at home, and not engaged in actual warfare, employed, and profitably employed, so that they can pay the taxes we are compelled at this time to levy upon them; and there is no other way for us to do than to keep every machine and every hand in the country in operation.

If we shall take the course which seems to be indicated by the speeches last delivered upon the opposite side of the House, to encourage a system of jealousy of one part of the Union against the other, I can easily foresee there will be some difficulty in putting down this rebellion, and that the war will last some considerable time longer than has been hitherto estimated. But, for one, I entertain no such feeling, and the State I represent, being an agricultural State, and having no larger interest in manufactures than Illinois and some other western States, possibly not so large, has no such feeling. We believe it is for our interest to create a market for our agricultural products, to consume our raw materials at home, and give employment to our own people rather than those from abroad.

If gentlemen will examine the facts, they will find that in the West a large and increasing amount of capital is being invested in manufactures; and I foresee ere long that such a State as Illinois and other western States will become the seat of large and profitable manufactures, more profitable than they now are in New England. The people who are manufacturing in New England will have to remove their establishments to places where they can obtain coal with which to obtain a cheaper motive power than they can have where they are now located. The gentlemen who are engaging in this system of creating sectional jealousy upon this subject will find ere long that they are fighting against their own people.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last three words, and I do so for the purpose of replying to the remarks more particularly of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] I am in favor, since this system of taxation has been resorted to for the purpose of raising a revenue to support the Government, of making it operate as equally upon all classes of men in every State as possible; and while gentlemen upon the other side insist that the products of Illinois shall be taxed threefold their real value, I insist that the products in the hands of New England manufacturers shall bear their proportion of the burdens of taxation. That they have not heretofore done so, that they do not do so now, or that they will not do so under this proposition, is too clear for any man to doubt. The manufacturers of New England are growing rich; they boast of the prosperity of their people. I would to God the agricultural interests of the West could thus boast. While they have been able upon their products to realize within the last two years more than three hundred per cent. upon their goods than they did four years ago, we in the West are selling them our wheat at a dollar a bushel, and our beef at less price than we received three years ago; and that, too, in a depreciated currency. Three years ago a bushel of wheat in the market would purchase ten yards of common domestics of New England manufacture. To-day it will purchase but two. We are therefore paying an indirect tax unprecedented in the history of the country; and we are paying that bonus to New England manufacturers and the Government together. While they can sell to the operatives in their establishments any amount of manufactured articles free of tax, they pay no revenue to the Government, except three per cent. on what they sell to us, they never fail to charge that additional three per cent. upon the article they furnish us. It is giving to them, sir, an advantage over what the consumers of the West enjoy. It is unjust; and I tell the gentleman from Vermont that, notwithstanding his constituents, agricultural as they are, protected by the tariff upon wool, may be satisfied with this condition of things, the people of the Northwest are not satisfied with it, and will not be satisfied. I have no more to say.

Mr. DAWES. I merely wish to say a single word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois. I do not desire to enter into that strain of argument in which he and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] have indulged. I am not going to reciprocate that kind of feeling in which they seem to indulge. I wish, however, to correct some of their statements. Before I do that, I am curious to inquire of my friend from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] who first spoke, how he proposes to raise sufficient revenue to carry on the expenditures of this Government? He is for free trade. He is against all internal taxation. He has done himself the honor to vote against every measure for that purpose that has ever been introduced into this House. I know of no measure tending to supply the Treasury even for its current expenditures that ever had the support of my friend from Indiana, except the motion to repeal the present tariff and substitute for it that of 1846. He is opposed alike to imposts and to internal taxation; but he is constant and consistent on every opportunity in inveighing against New England, and in attempting to show to the country that his part of the Union has to bear burdens for the benefit of New England. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] follows in the same strain. I ask them if they want a real estate tax, and why it is, if they are disposed to impose this tax equally upon all the interests and all the capital, that, with a very large majority in this House, they do not impose this tax upon real estate? I ask them if they are willing to state here that New England interests have profited more, and that New England has profited more than the real estate of the great Northwest? Has it not risen in value? Has it not risen millions where the property of New England has risen thousands? Do the gentlemen think that there are no consumers of the products of New England but in the Northwest? Does not New England supply herself as well as the Northwest? Does not the capitalist of New England or the manufacturer of New England, besides paying three per cent. on all his products, also pay his three and five per cent. upon his income? And does not my friend from the West know that whatever tax is put upon those products of his that he is complaining of at this time, he gets it back just as we get back ours? He complains of the tax upon whisky. Well, those at the East who use his whisky have to pay that tax back, just precisely the same as they of the West pay back whatever tax is imposed upon our cotton and woolen fabrics. It equalizes itself upon all productions. The gentleman has the market of the world, and he has the capital of New England to bring the market of the world to his own door. He takes our capital out into the western country, and he brings by that process his rich valleys and prairies to the market of the world, and they rise in value; and his region of country rises in prosperity and in population beyond all calculation. And why do not we of the Northeast, struggling against climate and soil, and under every natural difficulty that can be imposed upon us, why do not we complain of that prosperity? Have we treated them with an illiberal hand? Has the capital of New England been turned away from them? Has the support of New England to the measures of internal improvement been withheld? Has there been anything to justify an attack upon his part upon the industry, the capital, or the votes of New England here in this House in their treatment of the Northwest? Nothing, whatever. It is gratuitous; it is political; it is uncalled for by anything connected with the course of New England upon this floor or elsewhere.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. I renew it, and I do it with the purpose of detaining the House but a moment. There is a line of argument—it is not argument, however—a line of talk, always indulged in by gentlemen upon the opposite side of the Chamber when a discussion upon these questions arises, that, to use the mildest term, is scarcely tolerable to those who feel that their material and pecuniary interests are involved in the question.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] rises and deprecates sectionalism, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] follows in the same line, and says that he regrets this strain of debate, this line of discussion. I presume the gentlemen do. I know I would if I had as comfortable a thing at somebody else's expense as their constituents have upon this question; I would not want it discussed either. If I was so secure in wealth as their constituents are, or if my people were prospering and flourishing and spreading out the branches of their prosperity before the world at the expense of somebody else, unless I was moved by a higher sense of justice than I have ever seen animate a single breast on the other side of the House upon this question, I too, like them, should desire silence on the subject.

I should say, "Let us have no talk about it." I should say, "Let us have no fuss; I am very comfortable, and cannot see why all the rest of the world should not be so too." I have no doubt the highwayman, when he grasps his victim on the highroad, would rather have him keep still. I have no doubt the burglar, when he breaks into a dwelling-house, is very much annoyed if the screams of the inmates disturb him at his felonious labors. Ah! say they, we must have peace. We must have no screaming. Well, quit robbing us. Take your hands out of our pockets. Quit filching the rewards of our honest labor from our pockets for the benefit of men who are no abler, no truer, no more patriotic, to say the least of it, than the people which the gentleman from Illinois, myself, and others on this side of the Chamber represent here. Meet the argument, and stop this talk. Does the manufacturing interest pay anything to the support of the Government? Or does the agricultural interest pay it all? I am not to be deterred from the argument by this line of talk. Ah! you are comfortable and cosy, gentlemen. It is not so with the people that you and I, Mr. Chairman, [Mr. Cox in the chair,] represent on this floor.

Of course, on this question of sectionalism the retort is very handy, so apparent to everybody, so ready to every lip, that I do not condescend to use it. The whole world will take notice with what propriety anybody on that side of the Chamber can talk of sectionalism, their party having been built up on the idea of pure sectionalism for more than thirty years past.
